It only remains to notice the exceptions taken [552] to the exclusion of the testimony offered, that the law of New York required an oath or certificate to be annexed to the assessment roll substantially different from the oath actually annexed, and the claim that the plaintiff has a right to recover the taxes assessed in 1873 and collected in 1874. The exclusion of the testimony as to the alleged defect in the assessment roll was correct under the stipulation of the parties, that the plaintiff would not claim a right to prove any failure of the assessors to take the proper oath. A defect in the form of the oath annexed, if there be one, could have no bearing upon the question at issue. The claim for the taxes assessed in 1873 is open to similiar objections to those presented against the claim for the taxes of the other years. If the assignors of the plaintiff had any just grounds of complaint to the assessment as excessive they should have pursued the course provided by statute for its correction, or resorted to equity to enjoin the collection of the illegal excess, upon payment or tender of the amount due upon what they conceded to be a just valuation.

It follows that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

Patents—construction of, as to combination.

The language of the specification in letters patent No. 127933, for an improvement in steam bell ringers, limits the first claim to a combination in which the piston and piston rod are detached from each other.

Argued April 19, 1887. Decided May 2, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York. Opinion below published, 18 Fed. Rep. 602. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. James A. Allen, for appellants.
Mr. George Payson, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants, who were complainants below, filed their bill in equity August 7, 1882 against the defendant, to restrain the alleged infringement of letters patent No. 127933, granted to the Buffalo Dental Manufacturing Company, as assignee of George B. Snow, on [618] June 11, 1872, for a new and useful improvement in steam bell ringers; the Buffalo Dental Manufacturing Company being a joint stock association under the laws of the State of New York, of which the appellants were the sole officers, directors, shareholders, associates, and persons in interest. The specifications, with drawings annexed, of this patent are as follows:

"Specification describing certain improvements in Steam Bell-Ringing Apparatus, invented by George B. Snow, of Buffalo, in the County of Erie, State of New York.

"This invention relates to the construction of a steam bell ringer in such a manner as to prevent any apparent leakage, either of water or steam, without resorting to the use of stuffing boxes; and also to cause the admission and release of the steam directly by the motion of the piston, and without the use of any intermediate parts between the piston and valves.

"Referring to the annexed drawing, Figure 1 is an elevation of the device as applied to the bell of a locomotive. Fig. 2 is a vertical section of the steam cylinder on the plane a b, on an enlarged scale.

"A is a single acting steam cylinder, connected to the crank B on the bell yoke by the slotted rod C. This rod should be of such a length that the piston G will be forced to the bottom of the cylinder as the crank B passes its lower center, the slot through which the crank pin passes being long enough to allow the crank to pass its upper center freely, notwithstanding the disproportion between the throw of the crank B and the length of stroke of the piston rod D. The piston G is disconnected from its rod D, to prevent any lateral strain being communicated to it, thereby decreasing to some extent the wear of the piston in the cylinder. The piston should be considerably longer than its length of stroke. The piston rod D passes through a sleeve in the cylinder cover I, which should be long enough to steady it and act as a guide, and is limited in its upward motion by the collar d. E is a conical exhaust valve, seating upward against the bottom of the piston G. F is the steam valve, also conical, and seating upward, containing within itself the tail of the ex-
19] haust valve E, such an amount of motion being permitted between the two that the steam valve F will be raised to its seat and the exhaust valve E be opened as the piston approaches the upper end of its stroke. Exhaust passages M m are formed in the piston G, which communicate with the holes m' in the side of the cylinder by means of annular grooves turned in the side of the piston, the openings m' being of such a number and so disposed as to insure a constant communication with the passage M. The thimble H forms an annular space around the cylinder, from which the steam escapes through the passage O. If the piston is closely fitted, it will wear a long time with very little leakage, and what there may be will be caught in the annular grooves in the side of the piston, and passed at once through the exhaust passages m', thus preventing any leakage around the piston rod D. It is advisable to use a packing of a single ring at the lower part of the piston, not so much to avoid leakage as to sustain the piston at the upper end of its stroke by the elasticity of the ring, until it is brought to the bottom of the cylinder by the return swing of the bell. [620]

"The bell being set in motion, the crank B drives the piston to the bottom of the cylinder, closing the exhaust valve and forcing open the steam valve, admitting steam to the cylinder from the space S. As the piston is driven upward the exhaust valve is carried with it, and as the piston approaches the end of its stroke the steam valve is also raised to its seat, after which the exhaust valve is opened. As the pressure is relieved the exhaust valve drops, leaving the passage M entirely clear during the return stroke, which is made by the momentum of the bell on its return.

"The arrangement of valves shown is not essential, as the exhaust valve may be placed in a cavity in the body of the cylinder opening into the exhaust passage, and both the steam and exhaust valves be closed by the direct impulse of the steam, the openings m' being made low enough in the cylinder to allow the piston to pass them at the upper end of the stroke; or, by using a piston in the form of an inverted cup, the steam and exhaust may be worked through openings in the side of the piston and cylinder, the expansion of the steam doing the work. The disadvantage of the first of these plans is that the valves are closed so violently that they soon wear out; of the second, the difficulty of getting rid of water of condensation.

"Having thus fully described my device, I claim as my invention:

"1. The combination of the cylinder A, piston G, piston rod D, slotted rod C, and crank B, when constructed and operated substantially [622] as described.

"2. The combination of the valves E and F, both seating upward, with the piston G and passages M m m', for the purpose of admitting steam to and exhausting it from under the piston G, substantially as described."

The infringment alleged is of the first claim only, and consists in the use by the defendant below of steam bell ringers constructed and operated in conformity to the drawings and specifications of letters patent granted August 25, 1874, No. 154394, to Charles H. Hudson, for a new and useful improvement in steam bell-ringing apparatus. The specifications and illustrative drawings of that patent are as follows:

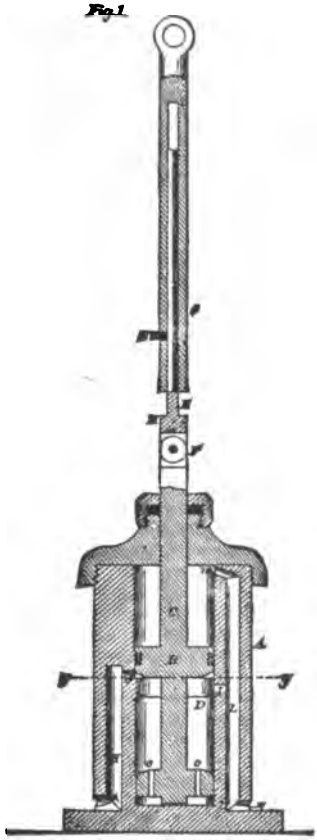

Fig. 2.

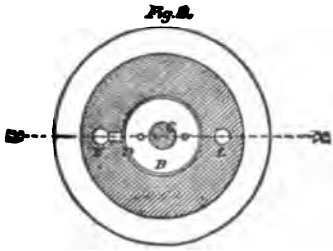

"To all whom it may concern:

"Be it known that I, Charles H. Hudson, of the City and County of Dubuque, Iowa, have invented a new and useful Improvement in Steam Bell-Ringing Apparatus, of which the following is a specification:

"This invention relates to steam engines, designed for ringing bells on locomotives and in other places; and consists in the construction and arrangement of parts, as hereinafter described, and specifically indicated in the claim.

"In the accompanying drawings, Figure 1 represents a vertical section of Fig. 2 on the line x x; and Fig. 2 is a horizontal section taken on the line y y, Fig. 1.

"Similar letters of reference indicate corresponding parts.

"This bell-ringing engine may be worked with either steam or air.

"A is the cylinder; B, the piston. C is the piston rod. D is the valve ring. E is a rod which is hinged to the piston rod at the point F. This rod E slides in the tube G, which is attached to the bell crank. This connection is such that the lower end of the tube G will be at the shoulder H when the bell crank is at the lowest point, and the piston at the bottom of the stroke. The movement of the tube upon the rod E will allow the bell to be turned over and the bell crank to go to its highest point freely, while the piston is at the lowest point.

"I is the exhaust port; J, the inlet port. The valve ring D is so arranged, in regard to the ports, that the movement of the piston to the lowest point moves the valve ring down, and closes the exhaust and opens the inlet port. When the piston moves to the other end of the stroke the ring is moved in the other direction, and the inlet is closed and the exhaust is opened. [624] K is the inlet passage. L is the exhaust passage. m is a small opening into the exhaust passage, to allow any steam which may pass the piston to escape. O O are ports or passages in the lower head of the double piston, to permit the steam (or air, if used) to act against the lower head of the cylinder.

"When the bell is in motion, the bell crank will press the tube down on the rod and force the piston to the bottom of the stroke, and thereby close the exhaust and open the inlet port. When the crank has passed the center of the stroke, the steam admitted by the movement of the valve ring presses the piston up and throws up the bell. The tube connection allows the bell crank to move freely upward after the piston has reached the end of the stroke, cut off the steam, and open the exhaust port. The return swing of the bell is followed by the same action of the parts.

"N is a small, set screw in the tube G, the end of which enters a groove, or acts against a flat side of the rod E, to prevent the piston rod from turning. Any other suitable device may be adopted for the purpose.

"I do not claim, broadly, the combination of a valve ring with a piston and cylinder for cutting off admission and escape of steam alternately; but,

"Having thus described my invention, I claim as new and desire to secure by letters patent:

"In combination with the vertical cylinder A, having inlet and exhaust ports K J and I L m, the double piston B having openings or passages O O in its lower head, and the valve ring D, arranged below the upper head thereof, as shown and described, to operate as specified."

The question of infringement turns upon the construction to be given to the first claim of the patent sued on, to determine which it is necessary to consider the state of the art at the time of its date. This is shown by a prior patent issued to Snow, No. 11307, dated July 11, 1854, and which had expired before the granting of the patent sued on.

The specifications and accompanying drawings of that patent are as follows:

[625] "To whom it may concern:

"Be it known that I, G. B. Snow, of Buffalo, in the County of Erie and State of New York, have invented a new and useful method of employing steam to ring the bells of locomotives, and other bells; and I do hereby declare that the following is a full, clear, and exact description of the same, reference being had to the accompanying drawings forming part of this specification, in which

"Fig. 1 is a longitudinal vertical section of the apparatus I employ applied to a bell.

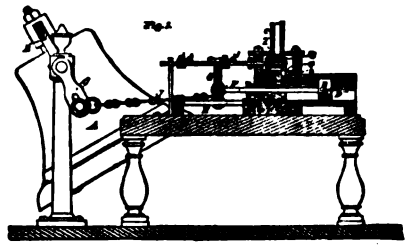
"Similar letters of reference indicate corresponding parts in both Figs.

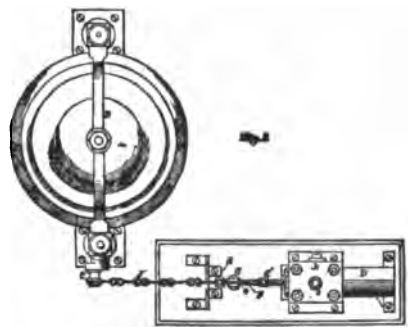
"My invention relates to the application of steam power to the ringing of the bell, and it consists of a novel combination and arrangement of a direct acting engine with the bell in such a manner that the bell, being swung by the engine in one direction, is allowed to swing in the opposite direction by its own gravity and momentum, and is caused thus continuously, automatically, to work with the same freedom [627] (but greater regularity and consequent increased clearness of note) as is obtained by the ordinary manual process of ringing.

"To enable others to make and use my invention I will proceed to describe its construction and operation:

"A in the drawing is the bell, which is suspended by a yoke, B, of the usual kind, furnished with a lever, C, for the purpose of ringing it. D is the steam cylinder, which is placed in a suitable position for its piston E to connect with the yoke, and by its movement to swing the bell. The bore of the cylinder for a locomotive engine would require to be of a diameter about one and a quarter (1¼) inches, and of a length about four and a half (4½) inches. The piston rod F works through a stuffing box at one end of the cylinder, which is closed, and it carries a cross head, G, which works on a fixed guide rod, H. The other end of the cylinder is open to the atmosphere. At the closed end of the cylinder there is a valve box or steam chest, K, which receives a steam pipe, c, from the boiler, and has a steam port, a, leading to the cylinder and an exhaust port, b, leading to the atmosphere. The slide valve I, which this valve box contains has a rod, e, passing through a stuffing box and furnished with two tappets, d d', between which it is embraced by a fork on the cross head G. These tappets are adjusted so that the fork shall come in contact with them to open or close the steam port at the proper time, and thus regulate the movement of the piston. The cross head is connected with the lever C of the bell yoke B by a chain, J.

"Fig. 1 of the drawing represents the steam port a open, and the steam acting on the piston, which has nearly terminated its stroke, owing to the cross head having come in contact with the tappet d' and being about to move the valve to close the steam port and open the exhaust port. As soon as the steam is shut off and the momentum of the bell is spent, the latter will swing back, drawing with it the piston, until the cross head strikes the tappet d and moves the valve far enough to open the steam port and close the exhaust port, when the motion of the bell will be again reversed.





"The motion which is thus given to the bell is precisely similar to that produced in ringing by hand, and could not be produced by the direct application of steam power to swing it in both directions, which must produce too positive a motion and could not allow it to swing with the same freedom as when the power is only applied in one direction and the bell is allowed to return under the influence of gravitation alone. [628]

"I do not claim of itself, as new, ringing bells by the application of steam power, as such, in a positive manner, by rigidly connecting the engine with the bell in both directions of the swing of the latter, has before been done; nor do I claim the several devices herein named individually as new; but I do claim as new and useful, and desire to secure by letters patent, the manner herein described of ringing the bell by the application of steam power and the gravity and momentum of the bell combined by means of the direct acting engine attached by chain, or other equivalent mechanical device, to the bell, and arranged, combined, and operating with the bell as specified, and so that the bell is swung in one direction by the engine and then let loose or free to swing back in the opposite direction by its own gravity and momentum, to produce the ring or sound, and the steam alternately admitted to and exhausted from the engine by the action of the engine and movement of the bell combined, substantially as specified, and whereby the same freedom in the swing of the bell to produce a long and clear sound, as is produced by the ordinary manual process, but with greater regularity and consequent increased clearness of note, is automatically obtained, as herein set forth."

On final hearing in the circuit court, the bill was dismissed for the reasons stated by the circuit judge in his opinion, as follows:

"Although the complainants' patent of June 11, 1872, suggests the principle and the most valuable parts of the combination found in the defendant's steam bell ringer, the plain and explicit language of the specification requires a construction of the first claim which will enable the defendant to escape liability as an infringer. The first claim must be limited to a combination in which the piston and piston rod are detached from each other.

"The patentee doubtless considered that the detachment of the piston and piston rod would assist materially in effecting one of the two expressed objects of his invention; viz., the prevention of leakage of steam. To prevent the escape of steam around the piston rod, he proposed to confine the steam behind the piston instead of introducing it into the cylinder in front of the piston, as was done in his earlier invention. Accordingly, he located the steam passages behind the piston, and adopted a tightly fitting piston; and, in order that the piston might remain tight, he adopted a detached piston rod to relieve the piston from lateral strain. The specification states that 'The piston is disconnected from its rod to prevent any lateral strain being communicated to it, thereby decreasing, to some extent, the wear of the piston in the cylinder;' and further, 'If the piston is closely fitted it will wear a long time with very little leakage, and what there may be will be caught in the annular grooves in the side of the piston and passed at once through the exhaust passages, thus preventing any leakage through the piston rod.' The drawings show a detached piston rod, and all the co-operative devices are conformed and adjusted to a detached rod, such as the long sleeve in the cylinder, to guide it, and the collar on the end of the rod to limit its movements.

"It is impossible to ignore the particular construction of these two parts, which is thus pointed out as material. As the defendant's bell ringer does not contain such a piston or piston rod, infringement is not shown. The bill is therefore dismissed." 18 Fed. Rep. 602.

On this appeal, it is argued, on behalf of the appellants, that this construction of their patent is too narrow: and it is now contended that the detachment of the piston and piston rod is not an essential part of the description and claim of the invention patented. We cannot, however, but agree with the circuit judge, that the language of the specification limits the first claim to a combination in which the piston and piston rod are detached from each other. In describing his invention in the introductory part of the specification, the patentee manifestly divides it into two parts; the first relates "to the construction of a steam bell ringer in such [630] a manner as to prevent any apparent leakage, either of water or steam, without resorting to the use of stuffing boxes;" the second, "to cause the admission and release of the steam directly by the motion of the piston, and without the use of any intermediate parts between the piston and valves." The first claim covers the first part of this invention by "the combination of the cylinder A, piston G, piston rod D, slotted rod C, and crank B, when constructed and operated substantially as described." The second claim—which we need not further consider here, because not involved in the case—covers the second part of the invention.

In the description of the device, with reference to the drawings, the specification says: "The piston G is disconnected from its rod D, to prevent any lateral strain being communicated to it, thereby decreasing to some extent the wear of the piston in the cylinder."

It is not admissible to adopt the argument made on behalf of the appellants, that this language is to be taken as a mere recommendation by the patentee of the manner in which he prefers to arrange these parts of his machine. There is nothing in the context to indicate that the patentee contemplated any alternative for the arrangement of the piston and piston rod. The arrangement of the valves, as shown in the drawings, he declared not to be essential, and explained how they might be otherwise adjusted, and the comparative advantage and disadvantage of those plans; but no such language is used in reference to the connection between the piston and its rod. And when we compare the device as described in the specifications of the patent sued on with that of the patent of 1854, in which it was necessary to use stuffing boxes, and consider that one of the express objects expected to be accomplished by the improvement contained in the patent of 1872 was to prevent leakage of water or steam without resort to stuffing boxes, the conclusion seems unavoidable that the patentee intended the detachment of the piston from its rod as an essential part of the combination to be covered by the first claim.

The decree of the Circuit Court is therefore affirmed.

Patents—letters patent No. 47764—state of the art—strict construction of claims—infringement.

1. In view of the state of the art the claims of letters patent No. 47764, for an improvement in harness hooks, or snaps—if they cover a patentable invention—must be restricted to the precise form and arrangement described in the specification.
2. Said letters patent are not infringed by the device of the defendants.

Argued Jan. 11, 12, 1887. Decided May 2, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut. Opinion below published, 16 Fed. Rep. 243. Reversed, Remanded.

The case is sufficiently stated by the court.

Mr. William Edgar Simonds, for appellants.

Messrs. John K. Beach and John S. Beach, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit on a patent granted to Charles [479]

B. Bristol, May 16, 1865, for an improvement in harness hooks or snaps; the complainants being assignees of the patent. These hooks are usually attached to the end of a strap or chain for the purpose of fastening it to a ring or staple, as in the case of a tie strap for fastening a horse to a post. The small hook by which a watch chain is fastened to the ring or stem of the watch is an example. It has a movable part called the tongue, which is connected to the shank of the hook by a pivot, and is kept in place against the end of the hook by the pressure of a spring acting between the shank and the tongue. The tongue may be pressed inward, so as to admit the ring or staple, and is thrust back to its place by the action of the spring. In some form or other the implement has long been in use. The patent in question relates to the mode of arranging the spring in the tongue and of attaching both to the shank of the hook. The complainants' expert says: "The invention shown and described in the patent of Bristol is an improvement in that class of snap hooks in which the tongue is pivoted in a recess between two cheeks in the shank. In this recess a coil spring is arranged around the pivot so that the two ends of the spring bear, one upon the tongue and the other upon the body of the hook, tending to press the tongue up against the end of the hook, but yet permit the tongue to be depressed to 480] open the hook. In this class of hooks, prior to Bristol, the tongue was cast with a recess upon its under side to form two cheeks corresponding to the cheeks in the shank of the hook. The cheeks on the tongue were drilled corresponding to the hole through the cheeks in the shank, so that a rivet could be inserted through the sides of the shank and both sides of the tongue to form the pivot on which the tongue would turn. The coil of the spring was arranged around the pivot, the two ends bearing, one upon the shank and one upon the hook, as before described."

The principle of this arrangement was exhibited in many different forms. Sometimes the spring merely passed around the pivot without any coil; sometimes a straight spring was so secured to the one part and made to press against the other as to effect the same object. One would hardly suppose that a patentable invention could have been made in relation to this little device. But many patents have been, and probably more will be, granted. The Bristol patent, now sued on, is one of the latest in the series which has been brought to our attention.

The particular contrivance which is claimed as an invention in this patent may be described as follows: Instead of having a separate pivot, or pin, to pass through the cheeks or ears of the hook and tongue for the purpose of connecting them together and holding the coil of the spring, a small projection or fulcrum, to answer the purpose of a pivot, is cast as a part of one of the cheeks of the hook, on its inner side, and the cheeks (being made of malleable cast iron) are spread further apart, and the recess between them is thus wider than they are intended to be when the article is finished. The coil of the spring is placed on the projecting fulcrum. The tongue is made with a recess as usual, but one side of this recess is left open, the other side having the ordinary cheek perforated with a hole to admit the fulcrum pivot. The tongue, thus constructed, is placed in the recess of the hook and slipped over the spring and pivot; and then by means of a vice or press, the outside cheeks of the hook are squeezed together until the fulcrum pivot passes through [481] the hole in the cheek of the tongue, and comes in contact with the opposite cheek of the hook. The patentee, after having described the construction of the several parts, explains the mode of putting them together as follows:

"Having made the parts as before described, I place the spiral spring, Fig. 4, on the projection or pin n, Fig. 2, and slip the tongue, Fig. 3, onto the projection or fulcrum pin n, so that the spring, Fig. 4, will rest in and be inclosed by the recess r, with the two tangential parts h and i pointing toward the hook a. I then place the article in a proper vice or press and close up the cavity between c and d until the pin n comes in contact with the side or ear c, Fig. 2, when the whole will appear as represented in Fig. 1 (except the strap A.), and will be ready for use or sale."

The claim of the patent is as follows; namely,

"What I claim as my invention and desire to secure by letters patent, is:

"1. The combination of the tongue g, with the spiral spring, Fig. 4, when the spring works on the torsion principle and rests in a recess (as r), in the rear end of the tongue, substantially as herein described.

"2. The combination of the fulcrum pin n with the tongue g, when the pin n is cast in one of the ears, and the recess or cavity is fitted to be closed, substantially as herein described."

Only the first claim is relied on in the present suit, as the defendants do not use the fulcrum pivot, cast with the cheek of the hook, but the ordinary pivot inserted in holes in both cheeks.

The defense is threefold; namely, 1. That the supposed invention was described in previous patents; 2. That, in view of the state of the art, the device claimed as new was not a patentable invention; 3. That, upon a proper construction of the patent, the defendants do not infringe it.

Several prior patents were given in evidence which show, if not an entire anticipation of, at least a very near approach to, the invention claimed.

In 1852 a patent was issued to Palmer & Simmons for an improved hook for whiffletrees, embodying the same principle as the snap [482] hook, in which the recess of the tongue, enclosing the spiral spring, having precisely the same object as the recess of the tongue and spring in Bristol's and other snap hooks, had but one cheek, the other side of the recess being open until it was applied to the end of the whiffletree supporting the hook, by which it was closed up when the parts were brought together. The connection of the two was made by a pivot passing entirely through the cheek of the tongue and the coil spring enclosed therein, and into the end of the whiffletree. This pivot had a broad head, which compressed the tongue and kept it in place, in the same manner as is done by the cheek of the hook in Bristol's snap hook.

In 1859 one Daniel H. Hull patented a trace fastener, which contained a similar device, so far as the arrangement of the tongue and spring are concerned. The tongue, called in the patent the latch, had a recess containing the spring which was open on the inside, opposite to a slight recess in the slotted fastener, which corresponded to the hook in the snap hook. The pivot on which the tongue moved, and which passed through the spiral spring, was of the usual kind, and not cast as part of the fastener or of the latch.

In January, 1864, a patent was granted to one C. S. Abeel for an improvement in safety hooks, in which he dispensed with both the ears of the tongue by the use of one or two straight springs, one end of which was inserted in a slight groove in the recess or chamber of the hook, and the other resting against the tongue either in a groove or against a projection or shoulder.

In December of the same year, a patent was granted to Oliver S. Judd for an improvement in snap hooks, in which the spring was arranged in the recess of the tongue and operated exactly like the spring in Bristol's hook; the only difference between the two being, that in Judd's hook the pivot passed through both the hook and the tongue, and the latter had two cheeks, one on each side of its recess. The arrangement of the spiral spring, with both tangential ends projecting forward towards the hook, was precisely like Bristol's.

[483] These prior patents exhibit every feature of the Bristol snap hook, described in the patent sued on, except the single one of the fulcrum pivot cast as part of the cheek of the hook, and not passing through holes in both ears. This fulcrum is the only novelty shown in the patent; and this is not used by the defendants. The snap hook made by them has the same pivot which is used in Judd's hook, inserted in the same way, and passing through both cheeks of the hook. The only particular in which it differs from Judd's is that the tongue has but one cheek, and only one end of the coiled spring projects forward, towards the hook, resting against the tongue; whilst the other end projects backward, and presses against the side of the recess in the tongue, which is curved around and prolonged sufficiently for this purpose. It differs in two respects from the Bristol snap hook; to wit, in not using the fixed fulcrum cast as part of the cheek, and in not having both tangential ends of the spring projecting forward towards the hook, but having one of the ends projecting backwards and pressing, not against the tongue itself, but against the opposite side of its recess, prolonged sufficiently for the purpose.

It is obvious from the foregoing review of prior patents, that the invention of Bristol, if his snap hook contains a patentable invention, is but one in a series of improvements all having the same general object and purpose; and that in construing the claims of his patent they must be restricted to the precise form and arrangement of parts described in his specification, and to the purpose indicated therein. As we have seen, with one exception (the solid pivot), all the parts are old, and have been used in combination in other things of the same general character. The use of a recess in the tongue with one of its ears or cheeks removed was to adapt it to the new element referred to; namely, the solid pivot; and although the first claim of the patent is for the tongue thus constructed, in combination with the spiral spring as arranged in connection with it, yet this claim must be construed in reference to the purpose for which the tongue and spring, thus arranged, were intended; namely, for adjustment upon the solid pivot. Without this relative purpose, the combination of the tongue and spring, by itself, would be anticipated by [484] the patent of Palmer and Simmons, and that of Hull. If it has any novelty, it consists in its new application to the snap hook as devised by Bristol; and this was a snap hook provided with the peculiar solid pivot, or fulcrum pin, which is the subject of his second claim, and to which, as we have seen, the form and arrangement of the tongue and spring were specially adapted, and requisite to its beneficial use. This necessary restriction of the first claim renders it clear that it is not infringed by the defendants; for, as before stated, they do not use the solid pivot, but the old and long-used pin, passing through both ears or cheeks of the tongue and the hook.

The defendants also use a different device from that described by Bristol, in the arrangement of the spiral spring, the two ends of which, instead of pointing towards the hook, point in different directions one towards the hook and pressing against the body of it, and the other in the opposite direction, and pressing against the side of the recess in the tongue, which is prolonged and curved around for that purpose.

On the whole view of the case, we are satisfied that the defendants do not infringe the patent sued on when construed as it must be to give it any validity.

The decision of the Circuit Court must, therefore, be reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to dismiss the bill.

Bill to quiet title—possession and legal title as requisites—Statute of Nebraska—sale on execution of equitable title—payment—jurisdiction of the United States Courts.

2. The Nebraska Statute dispenses with the requisite of possession, but not with that of legal title in the complainant.

3. In the case presented it is held that the complainant's grantor acquired through a certain sale on execution merely the equitable title of the premises in question, and that his subsequent payment of the amount due the holder of the legal title did not devest the latter of said title.

4. Where a local statute gives the remedy by bill in equity to quiet title, without requiring the complainant first to obtain possession, such remedy may be administered in appropriate cases by the courts of the United States.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska. Reported below, 5 McCrary, 43. Reversed, Remanded.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Gray:

This case, so far as is material to the understanding of the appeal, was a bill in equity by Martin Spitley, a citizen of Illinois, against George W. Frost and wife, citizens of Nebraska, [553] Thomas C. Durant, a citizen of New York, and the Credit Mobilier of America, a corporation of Pennsylvania, alleging that the plaintiff was entitled to two lots of land in the City of Omaha, County of Douglass, and State of Nebraska, under a sale on execution against Frost to one John I. Redick, and a conveyance from Redick to the plaintiff, and praying for a decree quieting the plaintiff's title and ordering a conveyance to him of the legal estate. Frost and wife, by answer and cross bill, denied the validity of the sale on execution, and claimed the land as a homestead. After the completion of the pleadings between Spitley and Frost and wife the case was referred to a master, whose report was confirmed by the circuit court, and a final decree was entered for Spitley on his bill against Frost and wife, their cross bill was dismissed, and they appealed to this court. Durant and the Credit Mobilier were not served with process, the record did not show publication of the notice ordered to them upon either bill, they did not appear in the cause, no decree was rendered against them, and they were not made parties to the appeal.

The material facts, as appearing by the admissions in the pleadings, the master's report, and the evidence taken in the case, were as follows:

Prior to 1866, the Credit Mobilier, in whose employ Frost was, purchased the land in question, took the title in the name of Durant, its president, and built a house upon it for the use of Frost and his family, under an agreement between the corporation and Frost, by which the title was to be conveyed to him upon a final settlement between them. Frost and his family forthwith took possession of the land, and thenceforth occupied it as a homestead, and were in possession when this bill was filed.

On November 11, 1870, Redick, who was an attorney, and Frost made and signed the following agreement: "In consideration of $2500 as attorney's fees, I agree with Hon. G. W. Frost that I will bring suit and procure, through the courts or otherwise, to him a good title to the premises he, said Frost, now occupies as his residence in the City of Omaha; and in case [554] [of] any settlement or arrangement of the suit, then said Frost is to pay in proportion only; and in case said Frost fails to procure said title at all, then the said attorney is to have a mere nominal fee for his services, to wit, $100."

Redick accordingly, on April 29, 1871, brought a suit in equity on behalf of Frost against the Credit Mobilier and Durant in the courts of Nebraska, and in that suit, on March 27, 1876, obtained a decree that upon Frost's paying the said defendants within thirty days the sum of $302.71, remaining due from him to them, they should convey the land to him. That sum was not paid within the time fixed, Frost contending that Redick, by the agreement between them, was bound to pay it. On November 11, 1876, said defendants executed a quitclaim deed to Frost, but it was never delivered to him or recorded. Durant afterwards brought an action of ejectment for the land against Frost, which was pending until June 8, 1880, when Redick, having been made a defendant therein on the ground of his having succeeded to Frost's rights in the property under the proceedings stated below, paid that sum with interest, and the action of ejectment was thereupon dismissed.

On June 26, 1877, Redick brought an action at law to recover his fee of $2,500 against Frost in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska, in which, on July 30, 1877, he obtained a writ of attachment, on which this land was attached, and was appraised at $6,000; on March 14, 1878, recovered judgment; and on July 1, 1878, obtained an order of sale as upon execution, on which this land was appraised, "after deducting all prior liens thereon," at $500 the appraisers adding, "The said defendant's only interest in said property, as appears by the records of Douglas County, Neb., being that of occupancy and possession, we appraise the said interest as above;" and the marshal, on August 24, 1878, after thirty days' advertisement of "the property described in this order," sold by auction Frost's interest in these lots to Redick for $350. Frost's solicitor at the time of the sale gave notice to the marshal that Frost claimed the land as his homestead, and afterwards moved the court to set aside the sale for this and other reasons. But the court, upon a hearing, confirmed the [555] sale, and directed the marshal to execute and deliver to Redick a deed in the usual form, which was accordingly done; and Redick, on September 8, 1880, conveyed to Spitley, the present appellee.

Mr. John L. Webster, for appellants.

No counsel appeared for appellee.

Mr. Justice Gray, after stating the case as above reported, delivered the opinion of the court:

The opinion of the circuit court proceeded upon the grounds that Frost's homestead right, as against the contract made by him with Redick in 1870, and the judgment and execution afterwards obtained by Redick on that contract, was governed by the Homestead Act of Nebraska of 1866, by which no consent of the wife to an alienation of the homestead was required; and that the sale on execution, confirmed by the court, cut off the right of homestead. 5 McCrary, 43. But it is unnecessary to consider the validity of either of those grounds, because, even if they are well taken, Spitley's bill cannot be maintained.

At the time of the sale on execution of Frost's interest in the land, the legal title was, and it still remains, in Durant. Although Frost, under his agreement with Durant and the corporation, and the decree which he had recovered against them, had been entitled to a deed of the land upon the payment of a certain sum of money, he had not paid the money, nor had any deed been delivered to him; so that his title, either by virtue of the agreement and decree, or by virtue of his occupation of the land as a homestead, never was anything more than an equitable title. The sale on execution against him (if valid and effectual) and the deed of the marshal passed only his equitable title to Redick; Redick's payment to Durant of the money unpaid by Frost did not devest Durant of his legal title; and Redick's subsequent conveyance to Spitley could pass no greater right than [556] Redick had. Spitley's title, therefore, at best, is but equitable, and not legal; and Frost, and not Spitley, is in actual possession of the land.

Under the jurisdiction and practice in equity, independently of statute, the object of a bill to remove a cloud upon title, and to quiet the possession of the real estate, is to protect the owner of the legal title from being disturbed in his possession, or harassed by suits in regard to that title; and the bill cannot be maintained without clear proof of both possession and legal title in the plaintiff. Alexander v. Pendleton, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 462 [3: 624]; Peirsoll v. Elliott, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 95 [8: 332]; Orton v. Smith, 59 U. S. 18 How. 263 [15: 393]; Crews v. Burcham, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 352 [17: 91]; Ward v. Chamberlain, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 430 [17: 319]. As observed by Mr. Justice Grier in Orton v. Smith, "Those only who have a clear legal and equitable title to land, connected with possession, have any right to claim the interference of a court of equity to give them peace or dissipate a cloud on the title." 18 How. 265 [15: 394]. A person out of possession cannot maintain such a bill, whether his title is legal or equitable; for if his title is legal, his remedy at law, by action of ejectment, is plain, adequate and complete; and if his title is equitable, he must acquire the legal title, and then bring ejectment. United States v. Wilson, 118 U. S. 86 [ante, 110]; Fussell v. Gregg, 113 U. S. 550 [28: 993].

It is possible that one who holds land under grant from the United States, who has done everything in his power to entitle him to a patent (which he cannot compel the United States to issue to him), and is deemed the legal owner, so far as to render the land taxable to him by the State in which it lies, may be considered as having sufficient title to sustain a bill in equity to quiet his right and possession. Carroll v. Safford, 44 U. S. 3 How. 441, 463 [11: 671, 681]; Van Wyck v. Knevals, 106 U. S. 360, 370 [27: 201, 204]; Van Brocklin v. Tennessee, 117 U. S. 151, 169 [29: 845, 851]. But no such case is presented by the record before us.

In Stark v. Starr, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 402 [18: 925], the suit was founded on a Statute of Oregon, authorizing "any person in possession" to bring the suit; the court, after observing that "his possession must be accompanied with a claim of right, legal or equitable," held that the plaintiff proved neither legal nor equitable title; and consequently the question whether an equitable title only would have been sufficient to [557] maintain the suit was not adjudged. In Reynolds v. Crawfordsville F. N. Bank, 112 U. S. 405 [28: 733], the decision was based upon a Statute of Indiana, under which, as construed by the Supreme Court of that State, an equitable title was sufficient, either to support or to defeat the suit. Jefferson R. R. Co. v. Oyler, 60 Ind. 388; Burt v. Bowles, 69 Ind. 1. See also Grissom v. Moore, 106 Ind. 296.

A Statute of Nebraska authorizes an action to be brought "by any person or persons, whether in actual possession or not, claiming title to real estate, against any person or persons who claim an adverse estate or interest therein, for the purpose of determining such estate or interest, and quieting the title to said real estate." Neb. Stat. Feb. 24, 1873, Rev. Stat. 1873, p. 882. By reason of that statute, a bill in equity to quiet title may be maintained in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska by a person not in possession, if the controversy is one in which a court of equity alone can afford the relief prayed for. Holland v. Challen, 110 U. S. 15, 25 [28: 52, 56]. The requisite of the plaintiff's possession is thus dispensed with, but not the other rules which govern the jurisdiction of courts of equity over such bills. Under that statute, as under the general jurisdiction in equity, it is "the title," that is to say, the legal title, to real estate, that is to be quieted against claims of adverse estates or interests. In State v. Sioux City & Pac. R. R., the Supreme Court of Nebraska said: "Whatever the rule may be as to a party in actual possession, it is clear that a party not in possession must possess the legal title in order to maintain the action." 7 Neb. 357, 376. And in Holland v. Challen, above cited, this court said, "Undoubtedly, as a foundation for the relief sought, the plaintiff must show that he has a legal title to the premises."

The necessary conclusion is that Spitley, not having the legal title of the lots in question, cannot maintain his bill for the purpose of removing a cloud on the title; he cannot maintain it for the purpose of compelling a conveyance of the legal title, because Durant, in whom that title is vested, though named as a defendant, has not been served with process or appeared in the cause; and for like reasons Frost [558] and wife cannot maintain their cross bill.

Decree reversed, and case remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to dismiss the appellee's bill, and the appellants' cross bill, without prejudice, the appellee to pay the costs in this court and in the Circuit Court.

Duties—shells—removal of outer surfaces by acids or mechanical means as manufactures of—practice—findings by jury—special verdict or agreed statement.

1. The application of labor to an article, either by hand or by mechanism, does not necessarily make it a manufactured article, within the meaning of that term as used in the tariff laws.
2. The removal of the outer surfaces of shells by acids or mechanical means does not constitute them manufactures of shells, within the sense of the statute imposing a duty of 35 per centum upon such manufactures.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court. Compare the following case of Hartranft v. Winters, post, 1015.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Frank P. Prichard, for defendants in error.

This is an action at law brought in a court of the State of Pennsylvania and removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, by the firm of J. H. Wiegmann & Son, against the Collector of Customs for the District of Philadelphia, to recover moneys alleged to have been illegally exacted by him as duties on imported merchandise. After a trial before a jury, the plaintiffs had a judgment for $55.29, and the defendant has brought a writ of error. The record contains the following statement of the result of the trial:

"The jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths or affirmation aforesaid, respectively do say that they find as follows, to wit:

"Plaintiff imported into the United States from London, in December, 1881, and May, 1882, a quantity of shells, on which he paid duties June 11, 1883. Among these shells were: 37½ doz. regius murex; 8 doz. green ears; 3 doz. white ears; valued at $71.68, on which the Collector imposed a discriminating duty of 10 per cent, or $7.16, as the products of a country east of the Cape of Good Hope; 12 doz. green snails; 27 doz. Lord's prayers; 12 doz. mottoes; 9 doz. Turk's caps; 3 doz. magpies; 8 doz. snails; 1 doz. trocus; 16 doz. green ears; 8 doz. white ears; valued at $125.70, on which the Collector imposed a duty of 35 per cent, or $44.09, as manufactures of shells

"The testimony in regard to these shells was as follows:

"Frederick W. Wiegmann. These shells were purchased in London. The merchants there obtain them from all parts of the world; they [611] are cleaned and prepared for market there; the epidermis is first cleaned off, and then the shells are ground or polished for the market; they are cleaned by acid; they are ground on an emery wheel to expose the pearly interior; the purpose of both operations is to fit the shells for market; we sell them for ornaments; we import them for the sea shore, and sometimes we sell them for buttons, handles to penknives, etc., there is no difference in name and use between the shells ground on the emery wheel and those not ground; the Lord's-prayer shell is sold for the same purpose; there is no new use.

"Dr. Joseph Leidy. [Regius murex shown witness.] That comes from Panama. [Green ear shown witness.] That is from the Pacific coast. [Two white ears shown witness.] One of these is from the west coast of Africa and the other from Japan. Most shells have three layers; they have the thin brown skin, the outside layer, like the common fresh water mussel, then they have an inner layer which is very brilliant. Very frequently the water is sufficient to wear off the skin, and they show the dull layer on the outside. By artificial means that opaque whitish layer is ground off by means of a wheel, and the inner laver is exposed, which presents that inner pearly appearance. [Samples shown witness.] These shells have had the outer layer ground off so as to exhibit the beautiful inner layer; that has been done by the application of a wheel, and afterward by polishing.

"Q. There is something here called the 'Lord's prayer.' I do not suppose you know it by that name, but please tell us about it.

"A. Well, I understand its nature. The shell happens to be of the kind which is very frequently imported and used as an ornament without any alteration whatever. The outer covering was taken off in the shape of letters, by first covering the letters with wax or grease, and then covering that with lime, having in the meantime eaten out the letters by acid or by etching. The object of taking off the epidermis is simply to show the internal beauty, for the purpose of ornament; and the object of taking off the second layer is the same, simply for the purpose of ornament.

"The jury find that the regius murex, green [612] ears, and white ears, are products of countries west of the Cape of Good Hope, as above testified, and that the discriminating duty on them amounted to $7.16, which, with interest to October 5, 1883, amounts to $7.72.

"The jury find that the green snails, Turk's caps, magpies, snails, trocus, green ears, and white ears have been ground upon an emery wheel in the manner and for the purpose described in the above testimony; that the duty collected on them as manufactures of shells amounted to $25.98, which with interest to October 5, 1883, amounts to $28.03.

"The jury also find that the Lord's prayers and mottoes have been etched with acid, in the manner and for the purpose described in the above testimony; that the duty collected on them as manufactures of shells amounted to $18.11, which, with interest to October 5, 1883, amounts to $19.54.

Recapitulation.

Discriminating duty.....	$ 7 72
Duty on ground shells.....	28 03
Duty on etched shells.....	19 54
	$55 29

"And the court reserved the following points:

"1. If the court should be of opinion that both the shells ground on an emery wheel and the shells etched with acids, in the manner found by the jury, were not liable to duty as 'manufactures of shells,' but were entitled to be admitted free, as 'shells unmanufactured,' then judgment to be entered in favor of the plaintiff for fifty-five dollars and twenty-nine cents.

"2. If the court should be of opinion that the shells etched by acids in the manner found by the jury were liable to duty as 'manufactures of shells,' but that the shells ground on an emery wheel, as found by the jury, were not so liable, then judgment to be entered in favor of the plaintiff for thirty-five dollars and seventy-five cents.

"3. If the court should be of opinion that both the shells ground on an emery wheel and [613] those etched by acids were liable to duty as 'manufactures of shells,' then judgment to be entered for plaintiff for seven dollars and seventy-two cents only, being the amount of discriminating duty on shells found by the jury to have been imported from countries west of the Cape of Good Hope."

The defendant then moved for a new trial, in refusing to grant which the court held "That, in order to render the shells subject to duty as 'manufactures of shells' something more must be done than simply to remove the outer surface either by acids or mechanical means; and that, while the shells retained their special form and character, they could not be classified as 'manufactures of shells.'"

The finding of the jury is not in the usual form of a special verdict, but the jury make certain findings, and the statement is that the court reserves the three points stated; and each point reserved is stated in one and the same form; namely, that if the court should be of opinion that the shells are dutiable thus and so, or are free from duty, then judgment is to be entered for the plaintiff for a specified sum. As the circuit court, and the counsel for both parties in that court, appear to have treated the findings and the reservation as amounting to either a special verdict or an agreed statement of facts, we are disposed to overlook the irregularity, and to consider the case on its merits. Mumford v. Wardwell, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 423 [18: 756].

It is contended, on the part of the government, that the shells were dutiable under the following provision of section 2504 of the Revised Statutes, Schedule M, page 481, 2d edition: "Shells, manufactures of: thirty-five per centum ad valorem."

On the other side, it is contended that the articles were free, under the following provision of section 2505, page 488, 2d edition, in regard to articles exempt from duty: "Shells of every description, not manufactured."

The Collector levied a duty upon the shells of 35 per centum. The circuit court held that they were exempt from duty. The question is whether cleaning off the outer layer of the shell by acid, and then grinding off the second layer by an emery wheel, so as to expose the brilliant [614] inner layer, is a manufacture of the shell, the object of these manipulations being simply for the purpose of ornament, and some of the shells being afterwards etched by acids, so as to produce inscriptions upon them. It appears that the shells in question were to be sold for ornaments, but that shells of these descriptions have also a use to be made into buttons and handles of penknives; and that there is no difference in name and use between the shells ground on the emery wheel and those not ground. It is contended by the government that the shells prepared by the mechanical or chemical means stated in the record, for ultimate use, are shells manufactured, or manufactures of shells, within the meaning of the statute.

By the Act of March 2, 1861, chap. 68, section 22, 12 Stat. at L. 192, a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem was imposed on "manufactures of shell," and by the Act of July 14, 1862, chap. 163, section 13, 12 Stat. at L. 557, that duty was increased to 35 per cent ad valorem. By the Act of July 14, 1870, chap. 255, section 22, 16 Stat. at L. 268, "shells of every description, not manufactured," were exempted from duty. These enactments were carried into the Revised Statutes.

It is stated in the brief on the part of the government that the interpretation of these provisions by the treasury department has not been uniform. In April, 1872, it ruled that "Shells which have merely been cleaned and polished with acids cannot fairly be classified as manufactures of shells." In July, 1876, it ruled that shells engraved by the application of acids were manufactured shells. In August, 1877, it ruled that where the manufacture of the shells consisted merely in polishing them and removing, by grinding or otherwise, a portion of the surface, the shells were exempt from duty, because their character and condition had not been materially changed, and they still preserved their identity as shells. At a later date, in regard to shells that had been cleaned by the use of the emery wheel and buffer, and shells which had been polished by the use of acids, it held that they were dutiable at the rate of 35 per centum, as manufactures of shells, on the ground that they had been advanced, by cleaning, grinding and otherwise, to a condition beyond that of crude, unmanufactured shells.

We are of opinion that the shells in question [615]
here were not manufactured, and were not manufactures of shells, within the sense of the statute imposing a duty of 35 per centum upon such manufactures, but were shells not manufactured, and fell under that designation in the free list. They were still shells. They had not been manufactured into a new and different article, having a distinctive name, character or use from that of a shell. The application of labor to an article, either by hand or by mechanism, does not make the article necessarily a manufactured article, within the meaning of that term as used in the tariff laws. Washing and scouring wool does not make the resulting wool a manufacture of wool. Cleaning and ginning cotton does not make the resulting cotton a manufacture of cotton. In "Schedule M" of section 2504 of the Revised Statutes, page 475, 2d edition, a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem is imposed on "coral, cut or manufactured;" and, in section 2505, page 484, "coral, marine, unmanufactured," is made exempt from duty. These provisions clearly imply that, but for the special provision imposing a duty on cut coral, it would not be regarded as a manufactured article, although labor was employed in cutting it. In Frazee v. Moffitt, 20 Blatchf. 267, it was held that hay pressed in bales, ready for market, was not a manufactured article, though labor had been bestowed in cutting and drying the grass and baling the hay. In Lawrence v. Allen, 48 U. S. 7 How. 785 [12:914], it was held that India Rubber shoes, made in Brazil, by simply allowing the sap of the India Rubber tree to harden upon a mold, were a manufactured article, because it was capable of use in that shape as a shoe, and had been put into a new form, capable of use and designed to be used in such new form. In United States v. Potts, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 284 [3:102], round copper plates turned up and raised at the edges from four to five inches by the application of labor, to fit them for subsequent use in the manufacture of copper vessels, but which were still bought by the pound as copper for use in making copper vessels, were held not to be manufactured copper. In the case of United States v. Wilson, 1 Hunt's Merchants' Magazine, 167,

Judge Betts held that marble which had been cut into blocks for the convenience of transportation was not manufactured marble, but [616] was free from duty, as being unmanufactured.

We are of opinion that the decision of the circuit court was correct. But, if the question were one of doubt, the doubt would be resolved in favor of the importer, "as duties are never imposed on the citizen upon vague or doubtful interpretations." Powers v. Barney, 5 Blatchf. 202; U. S. v. Isham, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 496, 504 [21:728, 730]; Gurr v. Scudds, 11 Exch. 190, 191; Adams v. Bancroft, 3 Sumn. 384.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by Anton Winters, brought in the state court of Pennsylvania and removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, against the Collector of Customs for the District of Philadelphia. The proceedings in it, and the questions arising, are in all respects the same as those in the case of Hartranft v. Wiegmann, just decided, the only difference being that in this case there were no shells called "green snails" or "mottoes" or "Turk's caps" or "magpies" or "trocus," and that there were shells [617] called "rose murex," "motto cowries," "banded snails," "Japan ears," "turbo shells," "red ears," and "pearl snails."

The same conclusion is arrived at as in the Wiegmann Case, and the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Street railroads — ejection from car — mistake in transfer ticket — instructions.

In an action against a street railroad company to recover damages for the forcible ejection from defendant's car, after the tender by the plaintiff of a transfer ticket which was intended for use on another line, it is held: that the instructions are not open to objections by the plaintiff, and that, taking the evidence and the charge together, it is clear that the jury found for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff himself was mainly in fault in regard to the mistake in the transfer ticket; and that no unnecessary force or violence was used in ejecting him from the car.

The conduct of the defendant's agents in this case was the more reckless and wanton, because they were bound to observe towards the plaintiff the utmost caution and vigilance for his protection while he was a passenger upon the defendant's cars.

Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 451 (26:141).

The evidence tends to show that the plaintiff paid his fare and became entitled to ride on the car from which he was forcibly ejected. The evidence also tends to show that he made an effort in good faith to comply with the regulation of the defendant as to procuring a transfer ticket. That he obtained the wrong ticket may or may not have been his error under the circumstances. That was for the jury to determine. But the defendant having knowledge of the mistake immediately after it occurred, and when it might have been corrected, and refusing to make any effort to rectify the error, and forcibly ejecting the plaintiff from the car, is such reckless disregard of a passenger's right as to make the defendant responsible for the injuries inflicted.

Messrs. Enoch Totten and W. D. Davidge, for defendant in error:

A conductor of a car has no discretion. He must collect the fare or receive a ticket. If the agent happens to give the passenger the wrong ticket, it is the passenger's duty to pay the fare or leave the car. He has his remedy at law for the breach of contract.

Mosher v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 326.

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

The defendant in error, the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, is a street railroad company doing business in the City of Washington, its road having two branches, crossing each other at right angles at the intersection of Pennsylvania Avenue and Seventh Street. Passengers who had paid their fare on either branch of the road, upon arriving at this crossing, were entitled to receive a transfer ticket which permitted them, without further payment, to take the other branch in the continuation of their journey.

The plaintiff in error, James N. Carpenter, who was also the plaintiff below, who testified to taking his passage on the Seventh Street branch of this road, got off at this crossing, received a ticket from the agent, who was stationed at that point for the purpose of delivering transfer tickets to passengers who wished to change cars, and took his seat in a car on the Pennsylvania Avenue branch going east toward the capitol. When the conductor of the car came around to collect tickets, it was found that Carpenter had a transfer ticket which was intended for use on the Seventh Street branch and not on Pennsylvania Avenue. The conductor refused to accept this ticket, and demanded of Carpenter the usual fare charged for riding on that road. After some altercation, Carpenter peremptorily refusing to pay the fare demanded or get off when requested so to do, the car was stopped and the conductor and driver put him off forcibly. He then brought suit against the Company. Upon a trial before a jury, a verdict was rendered for the defendant, and the judgment on this verdict, on appeal to the Supreme Court of the District in bank, was affirmed.

The entire testimony is embodied in a bill of exceptions, and no question arises on the admission or rejection of evidence, nor is there much contradiction in it, except that there may be some little difference between the statement of the plaintiff as to the degree of force used to put him off the car and that of the conductor and driver on the same subject.

[476] There were, however, some exceptions taken to the charge of the court, as well as to the refusal to give instructions prayed for by plaintiff. We think, however, that the charge given by the court sua sponte, when taken in connection with the verdict of the jury, contains all that need be considered. That charge is embodied in the fifth bill of exceptions, and is as follows:

"And thereupon the court instructed the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the agents of the defendant had made a mistake in giving to the plaintiff a transfer ticket, and instead of giving him a Pennsylvania Avenue transfer had given him a Seventh Street transfer, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and that in assessing the damages the plaintiff was entitled to have reasonable damages, compensatory for the treatment which he had received, and that the defendant Company was bound to see to it that the plaintiff was provided with a proper transfer, and that if the mistake had been made the responsibility therefor rested upon the Company and not upon the plaintiff.

"And the court further instructed the jury that if, upon the other hand, they believed that the conduct of the agents of the Company was wanton and malicious, and that they had purposely given him the wrong transfer, and that they had maliciously and wantonly ejected him from the car because of personal dislike or animosity, that then the plaintiff was entitled to recover and in assessing damages, in that view of the case, the plaintiff was entitled to recover not only compensatory but vindictive damages; and to this latter branch of the instruction the defendant, by its counsel, then and there objected, and the objection was overruled and an exception was duly noted.

"The court thereupon further instructed the jury that if the jury were satisfied from the evidence that the plaintiff did not get off from the Seventh Street car, as related by him, but that he came from the west-bound Avenue car, with the passengers from that car and presented himself, with those passengers, to the transfer agent of the defendant, and that the plaintiff received the Seventh Street transfer without objection or remark, and undertook to ride up- [477] on it on a Pennsylvania Avenue car, that the defendant was entitled to a verdict."

This whole charge, it seems to us, was eminently favorable to the plaintiff. The first point made in it was that if the jury believed from the evidence that the agent of the defendant had made a mistake in giving to the plaintiff a Seventh Street instead of a Pennsylvania Avenue transfer ticket, that then the plaintiff was entitled to recover. It is obvious from the verdict of the jury, which was against the plaintiff, that they did not believe that the agents of the defendant Company at the crossing were responsible for the mistake that had been made there; because in the same connection the court instructed the jury that if they were satisfied from the evidence that the plaintiff did not get off from the Seventh Street car, as related by him, but that he came from the west-bound Avenue car, with the passengers from that car, and presented himself, with those passengers, to the transfer agent of the defendant, and that the plaintiff received the Seventh Street transfer without objection or remark, and undertook to ride upon it on a Pennsylvania Avenue car, that the defendant was entitled to a verdict.

Taking these two charges together, in connection with the testimony, it is evident that the jury founded their verdict upon the hypothesis contained in the latter; namely, that either he did not get off from the Seventh Street car, but came from the west-bound Avenue car, or that he came with the passengers from that car and presented himself with them to the agent of the defendant in a way to lead him to believe that he came from the Avenue car and desired to proceed on the Seventh Street car, which was confirmed by his taking without objection or remark the Seventh Street car transfer ticket. The testimony also showed that Carpenter had traveled a great deal on the cars of the defendant Corporation, was familiar with the manner of transferring passengers, and must have known the character of the ticket which was handed to him if he had paid any attention to it whatever.

The remaining portion of the charge was also favorable to the plaintiff; that is, that if the [478] jury believed that the conduct of the agents of the Company was wanton and malicious, and that they had purposely given him the wrong transfer, and that they had wantonly and maliciously ejected him from the car, then the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and in assessing damages he was entitled not only to compensatory but to vindictive damages.

Taking the testimony, which is all set forth in the record and is but little controverted, together with the charge of the judge, we think it perfectly clear that the jury found a verdict for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff himself was mainly in fault in regard to the mistake in the transfer ticket, and that no unnecessary force or violence was used in ejecting him from the car. This renders a further consideration of the case unnecessary, and the judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia is affirmed.

Patents—demurrer to bill for infringement—failure to show grounds of decision—answers to hypothetical objections to the bill—jurisdiction in equity.

Upon appeal from a decree sustaining a demurrer to a bill for the infringement of letters patent No. 254993, for an "improvement in boots," this court not being furnished with a copy of the opinion of the court below, nor with any brief or argument for appellee, and this court being without knowledge of the grounds of said court's decision, it is held: that the bill is entirely sufficient to put the defendant upon his answer; and that the patent having been issued fifteen months before the bill was filed, and having nearly sixteen years then to run, and the bill alleging that the public has generally acknowledged and acquiesced in the validity of the patent, and that the invention has been put in practice by the plaintiff, and has been of great utility, it was not necessary to show a recovery at law, to warrant jurisdiction in equity, for an injunction and an account.

Argued April 22, 1887. Decided May 2, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado. Reversed, Remanded.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Leigh Robinson, for appellant.

No counsel appeared for appellee.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opin- [485] ion of the court:

This is a bill in equity, filed in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado, by George C. McCoy against Frederick Nelson, for the infringement of letters patent of the United States, No. 254993, granted to McCoy, March 14, 1882, for an "improvement in boots." The bill sets forth a copy of the patent, and of its specification and drawings, at length. The defendant interposed a general demurrer to the bill, for want of equity, specifying no grounds of demurrer. The court sustained the demurrer and entered a decree dismissing the bill, from which the plaintiff has appealed.

We are not furnished with a copy of any opinion of the circuit court, nor with any brief from the appellee, and the case was not orally argued on his part. We are left therefore without information as to the grounds upon which the demurrer was sustained.

The bill alleges that the plaintiff "is the original and first inventor of a new and useful improvement and invention in boots, which are fully and particularly described in the letters patent hereinafter mentioned, and which had not been known or used before his said invention." It then sets out that he applied for and obtained the patent. The patent states, on its face, that he has applied for a patent "for an alleged new and useful improvement in boots, a description of which invention is contained in the specifications, of which a copy is hereto annexed and made a part hereof." The patent grants to him, his heirs or assigns, for seventeen years from its date, "the exclusive right to make and vend the said invention throughout the United States and Territories." The specification states that he has "invented a new and improved boot, of which the following is a full, clear and exact description." It says: "The object of my invention is the production of a boot of novel and improved construction, [486] as hereinafter described and claimed." It refers to seven figures of drawings which accompany the specification, one of which "is a perspective view of my improved boot." It states that "the sole and heel of the boot are of ordinary form, and the upper and counter may be secured to the sole by any of the well known and common means." It then describes the vamp, the quarters which form the leg, the mode of sewing the quarters together, the hooks and holes for lacing and the lacing device, and the strip secured over the front seam, and the leather tongue which closes the opening in front in the main material of the leg and is itself secured to the leg pieces or quarters and the vamp. The claim is as follows: "Having thus described my invention, I claim as new, and desire to secure by letters patent, the herein described boot, consisting of the vamp B, the quarters d, sewed together in the back and a short distance in front from the top down, and provided with the hooks e, holes i, and a suitable lacing device, the strip f, secured over the said front seam, and the tongue G, secured to the said leg pieces and vamp, substantially as set forth." The bill then alleges that the plaintiff was and is the owner of the patent; that he has invested and expended large sums of money for the purpose of carrying on the business of making and selling boots containing the invention; that the invention has been of great utility; that boots were made according to it, and containing it, and sold by him, to the great advantage of the public; that the public have generally acknowledged and acquiesced in the validity of the patent and in his rights; that the defendant has manufactured, used and vended to others to be used, boots containing and embracing the invention, in the District of Colorado, without the license of the plaintiff, and in violation of his rights, and in infringement of the patent, with full knowledge of those rights, and to the injury of the plaintiff, whereby he has been and still is being deprived of profits which he otherwise would have obtained; and that the defendant has made and sold large quantities of said boots, and is still engaged in selling the same, and has a large quantity thereof on hand, which he is offering for sale, and has made large profits from such sales. The bill prays for an answer on oath; and that the defendant [487] may account for and pay to the plaintiff the profits acquired by the defendant, and the damages suffered by the plaintiff, from the unlawful acts of the defendant. It also prays for an injunction.

Groping in the dark and grappling with shadows, we are unable to perceive the objection to this bill. The brief of the appellant does not state upon what ground it is understood the court below proceeded. If it be suggested that the claim of the patent is for the boot described, and that the bill merely alleges that the defendant has made, used and sold boots containing and embracing the invention covered by the patent, instead of alleging that the defendant has made, used and sold the invention or the patented boot, we are of opinion that there is no force in the objection. If the boot made, used and sold by the defendant is not a boot consisting substantially of the parts mentioned in the claim of the patent, it does not infringe the patent, and is not, in judgment of law, a boot containing and embracing the invention, in the language of the bill. Although the claim of the patent is a claim to the described boot, consisting of the elements specified, the invention patented is an "improvement in boots," as stated in the patent, and any boot which contains that improvement, according to the terms of the claim, infringes the patent and is a boot containing and embracing the invention patented. The bill is entirely sufficient to put the defendant upon his answer, and the rights of the parties will be properly and adequately adjusted in the further proceedings in the cause. The bill is in accordance with approved precedents, and is in the usual form.

The patent having been issued fifteen months before the bill was filed, and having nearly sixteen years then to run, and the bill alleging that the public have generally acknowledged and acquiesced in the validity of the patent, and that the invention has been put in practice by the plaintiff, and has been of great utility, it was not necessary to show a recovery at law, to warrant jurisdiction in equity, for an injunction and an account. Root v. R. Co. 105 U. S. 189, 205 [26: 975, 981].

[488] The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded to that court, with a direction to take such further proceedings as shall be in conformity with this opinion.

APPEAL from and error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. B. R. Forman, for plaintiff in error and appellant:

The cases of Bondurant v. Watson, 103 U. S. 281 (26:447), and Kern v. Huidekoper, 103 U. S. 485 (26:354), seem conclusive of the only question in the case, and that the judge below erred in remanding the case.

Mr. Henry J. Leovy, for defendants in error and appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal under section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. 470, from an order of the circuit court remanding a suit or proceeding which had been removed from a state court. The record shows that a fieri facias had been issued out of the 19th Judicial District Court for the Parish of St. Mary, Louisiana, on a judgment in that court at the suit of Robert Todd, Trustee, against Robert B. Lawrence, under which certain lands claimed by Mrs. Frances E. Lawrence, a citizen of New Jersey, had been seized and advertised for sale on the second of June, 1883, by Minos Gordy, [635] the Sheriff of the county. The judgment had been assigned to Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company, a Louisiana corporation; and on the 31st of May, 1883, Mrs. Lawrence caused to be prepared what is called in the practice of the courts of Louisiana, a "petition of third opposition," to be filed in the 19th Judicial District Court of the Parish of St. Mary, to restrain Todd, the Trustee, the Railroad Company, and the Sheriff from selling the property under the seizure, claiming it as her own. This is a proceeding authorized by the Code of Practice of Louisiana (arts. 395, 396); but it must be had in the court which rendered the judgment in virtue of which the seizure has been effected. Art. 397. The petition was verified by the oath of Mrs. Lawrence May 31, and in her affidavit she stated "that Hon. T. S. Goode, the Judge of the 19th Judicial District in and for the Parish of St. Mary, is absent from said parish." A bond was also executed on the same day, such as the Code of Practice required in case of the allowance of an injunction, and at the foot of the petition, as printed in the record, is the following:

"Considering the allegations and prayer of the foregoing petition, it is ordered that the third opposition of the plaintiff be, and is hereby, allowed to be filed, and that an order and writs of injunction issue, as prayed for, on plaintiff giving bond and security, according to law, in the amount equal to one half of the claim under which the seizure enjoined was made.

"Granted at Franklin, Parish of St. Mary, this 31st day of May, A. D. 1883.

"(Signed) J. B. VERDIM, JR., Clerk."

All these papers were filed with the clerk of the 19th Judicial District Court on the first of June, and also the following:

"PARISH OF ST. MARY, 1 June, 1883.

"I hereby accept service of the foregoing petition and writ of injunction herein prayed for, and waive service of citation on me in the premises."

"(Signed) M. T. GORDY, Sheriff."

The record also shows a petition by Mrs. Law- [636] rence to the judge of that court, setting forth that she had "sued out of your honorable court a third opposition, coupled with a writ of injunction," for the purpose of restraining the sale under the seizure, as above stated, and praying for the removal of such suit to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana, on account of the citizenship of the parties, she being a citizen of New Jersey and all the defendants citizens of Louisiana. At the foot of this petition, as printed in the record, is the following:

"On the pleadings and proceedings herein, and on the petition and bond filed herein by plaintiff, Mrs. Frances E. Lawrence, under the provisions of the Acts and laws of the United States to regulate the removal of causes from state courts, and for other purposes, and on motion of counsel of petitioner in said case and the foregoing petition, it is ordered that the security offered by Mrs. Frances E. Lawrence, plaintiff therein; to wit, Townsend Lawrence, be approved, and that the state court proceed no further in the cause, and that this cause be removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of the State of Louisiana next to be held in said district.

"Dated this 1st of June, 1883.

"(Signed) F. S. GOODE, Judge."

The petition for removal and this order were filed with the clerk of the court on the second of June. On the 5th of November following, the suit was entered in the circuit court, and, on the 20th of March, 1884, the defendants moved that it be remanded. This motion was heard April 5, 1884, and granted April 7. From the order to that effect this appeal was taken.

Section 720 of the Revised Statutes provides that "The writ of injunction shall not be granted by any court of the United States to stay proceedings in any court of a State, except in cases where such injunction may be authorized by any law relating to proceedings in bankruptcy;" and, in Bondurant v. Watson, 103 U. S. 288 [26:450], which was a suit removed from [637] a state court on the application of the defendant after an injunction staying proceedings in the state court for his benefit had been granted, it was said: "If Watson had filed his petition for injunction in the state court, and before it was allowed had petitioned for a removal of the cause to the circuit court, with the design of applying to that court for his injunction, the objection to the right of removal would have force. That would have been an evasion of the statute." Such clearly is this case. The petition for removal was filed by the party who brought the suit; and there is nothing whatever in the record to show that the injunction he asked for was ever granted by the court or any judge thereof prior to the removal. The affidavit of Mrs. Lawrence shows that the judge was absent from the parish at the time the order which is in the record signed by the clerk purports to have been granted; and we have been referred to no statute or judicial decision in Louisiana authorizing the clerk to make such an order in the absence of the judge. Under the circumstances, therefore, the case is to be treated as having been taken to the circuit court to get an injunction, and not after one had been granted. This, we have no hesitation in saying, cannot be done; and, without deciding whether, under any circumstances, a proceeding such as this was in the state court can be removed to a circuit court, we affirm the order to remand.

Affirmed.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Iowa, Eastern Division. Reversed, Remanded.

The case is sufficiently stated by the court.

Messrs. Andrew Howell and W. A. Underwood, for appellants.

Mr. James H. Anderson, for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a decree dismissing the bill in a suit in equity begun by certain citizens of Michigan and Samuel M. Carpenter, Charles Wason, and Leander M. Hubby, citizens of Ohio, against Andros B. Stone, a citizen of New York, the St. Louis, Keokuk and Northwestern Railway Company, an Iowa corporation, the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company, an Illinois corporation, and Dan. P. Eels, a citizen of Ohio, to bring the defendants Stone and Eels to an accounting under a certain contract made by Stone with the complainants and others, by which he was to purchase the property of the Mississippi Valley and Western Railway Company, about to be sold under a decree of foreclosure, and [632] hold the same in trust for such of the holders of the bonds secured by the foreclosed mortgage as should surrender their bonds to him for use in paying the purchase money, and contribute such further sums in cash as should be necessary to enable him to meet the obligations of his bid at the sale. According to the allegations of the bill the defendant Eels became a trustee of the proceeds of a sale of the purchased property, made by Stone for the benefit of the parties in interest, which he has misappropriated and claims to hold in connection with Stone, adversely to the complainants and others in like interest. The character of the controversy is such that all the citizens of Ohio, who are parties to the suit, cannot be placed on one side so as to give the circuit court jurisdiction, under the construction which was given the second section of the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. 470, in the Removal Cases, 100 U. S. 457 [25:593], the first section being the same as the second so far as this question is concerned.

In Strawbridge v. Curtiss, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch, 267 [2:435], decided in 1806, it was held: "Where the interest is joint, each of the persons concerned in that interest must be competent to sue, or liable to be sued in those courts." "But," it was added, "the court does not mean to give an opinion in the case where several parties represent several distinct interests, and some of those parties are, and others are not, competent to sue, or liable to be sued, in the courts of the United States." In New Orleans v. Winter, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 91 [4:44], decided in 1816, a suit had been brought in the District Court for the District of Louisiana by the heirs of Elisha Winter, deceased, to recover possession of certain lands under an alleged grant from the Spanish Government. One of the plaintiffs could sue in the courts of the United States, but the others could not, and the question of jurisdiction in the district court was raised. Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, after referring to what had been decided in Strawbridge v. Curtiss, said: "In this case it has been doubted whether the parties might elect to sue jointly or severally. However this may be, having elected to sue jointly, the court is incapable of distinguishing their case, so far as respects jurisdiction, from one in which they were compelled to [633] unite." It was consequently held that the district court had no jurisdiction, and its judgment was reversed. This rule has been adhered to steadily ever since: Barney v. Baltimore, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 287 [18:827]; Coal Co. v. Blatchford, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 174 [20:180]; Sewing Machine Cases, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 574 [21:918]; and in removal cases, under section 2 of the Act of 1875, it has uniformly been applied, unless there is a separable controversy. Removal Cases [supra]; Blake v. McKim, 103 U. S. 336 [26:563]; Hyde v. Ruble, 104 U. S. 407 [26:823] and numerous cases since.

In the present case the rights of each and all of the parties depend on the alleged contract with Stone, and although, as between themselves, they have separate and distinct interests, they join in a suit to enforce an obligation which is common to all. There is but a single cause of action, and while all the complainants need not have joined in enforcing it, they have done so, and this, under the rule in New Orleans v. Winter [supra], controls the jurisdiction. It is, therefore, a suit to which citizens of Ohio are parties on one side, and a citizen of Ohio a party on the other, with interests so conflicting that the relief prayed cannot be had without keeping them on opposite sides of the matter in dispute. It follows that the circuit court was without jurisdiction, and could not render a decree dismissing the bill on its merits. For this reason the decree must be reversed (Continental Ins. Co. v. Rhoads, 119 U. S. 239 [ante, 380], and cases there cited); but as the error is attributable to the present appellants, whose duty it was to make the jurisdiction appear, the reversal will be at their costs in this court. Everhart v. Huntsville Female College, 120 U. S. 223 [ante, 623].

The decree is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill for want of jurisdiction, and without prejudice.

Jurisdiction—section 5, Act of 1875—determination from entire pleadings—Mexican grant—boundaries.

1. The circuit court cannot be required to keep jurisdiction of a suit simply because the complaint or declaration makes a case arising under the Constitution, laws or treaties of the United States if, from the entire pleadings, it appears that the averments making such a case are immaterial, and especially if they were evidently made "for the purpose of creating a case" cognizable by said court.

2. In the case presented it seems doubtful whether the complaint itself makes a case cognizable by the circuit court, as the rights of the complainant appear to depend merely on the boundaries of a certain Mexican grant confirmed and patented by the United States.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California. Affirmed.

The case is sufficiently stated by the court.

Mr. L. D. Latimer, for plaintiff in error.

No counsel appeared for defendants in error.

This is a writ of error sued out under section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. 470, for the review of an order of the circuit court dismissing a suit brought by Robinson, a citizen of California, against other citizens of the same State, for want of jurisdiction. The claim on the part of the plaintiff in error is that upon the face of the complaint it appears that the suit is one arising under the Constitution or laws or treaties of the United States, and that consequently the circuit court had jurisdiction by reason of the subject matter of the action; but on examination we find that, [523] according to the plaintiff's own showing in his complaint, his rights all depend on the boundaries of the Rancho Los Bolsas, granted by the Mexican Government to Manuel Nieto, and confirmed and patented to his representatives by the United States under the Act of March 3, 1851, chap. 41, 9 Stat. at L. 631, "to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California." Primarily these boundaries depend on the description of the land granted as found in the patent issued under the decree of confirmation, and it nowhere appears that either the Constitution or any law or treaty of the United States is involved in this.

It is true that in the complaint the plaintiff alleges that the several defendants claim to be the owners of parts of the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana, adjoining the Rancho Los Bolsas on the east, granted by the Mexican Government to Antonio Yorba in 1810, and confirmed and patented by the United States to Bernard Yorba and others in 1855; and that, if the ranchos overlap, the title of the defendants is the best, because the grant of the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana is the oldest and has precedence. He also alleges that the defendants claim "that they are 'third persons' as to whom the patents of Los Bolsas are not conclusive under the Act of" 1851, just referred to, and there are also some allegations as to the authority of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the laws of the United States, to order a resurvey of the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana, which had been once surveyed so as to exclude the premises in dispute. Many of the defendants answered, denying that they were in possession of any portion of the premises in dispute, and others claiming that they were in possession "by and with the consent of plaintiff made and given to defendants by plaintiff's agent, R. J. Northam, on or about the — day of June, 1882, and not otherwise." Others claim to be in possession "in severalty under and by virtue of written contracts for the conveyance of said several tracts of land * * * by the said plaintiff to said defendants." None of the defendants in their answers claim title under the grant of the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana.

Upon the pleadings the court dismissed the suit, evidently for the reason that it did not [524] "really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy within the jurisdiction" of that court. Such was the clear duty of the court under the Act of 1875, unless from the questions presented by the pleadings it distinctly appeared that some right, title, privilege or immunity, on which the recovery depended, would be defeated by one construction of the Constitution or some law or treaty of the United States, or sustained by an opposite construction. Starin v. New York, 115 U. S. 257 [29: 390].

Even if the complaint, standing by itself, made out a case of jurisdiction, which we do not decide, it was taken away as soon as the answers were in, because if there was jurisdiction at all it was by reason of the averments in the complaint as to what the defenses against the title of the plaintiffs would be; and these were of no avail as soon as the answers were filed and it was made to appear that no such defenses were relied on. The circuit court cannot be required to keep jurisdiction of a suit simply because the averments in a complaint or declaration make a case arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, if, when the pleadings are all in, it appears that these averments are immaterial in the determination of the matter really in dispute between the parties, and especially if, as here, they were evidently made "for the purpose of creating a case" cognizable by the circuit court, when none in fact existed. The provision in section 5 of the Act of 1875, requiring the circuit court to proceed no further, and dismiss the suit when it satisfactorily appears that "such suit does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within" its jurisdiction, applies directly to this case as it stands on the pleadings. The answers show that the case made by the complaint was fictitious and not real. The defendants either disclaim all interest in the land, or claim title under and not adverse to that of the plaintiff.

The order dismissing the case is affirmed.

HAMILTON A. MOORE, by Next Friend.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 558–575.)

Practice—Supreme Court of D. C.—appeals from special to general term—construction of statute—"insufficient evidence"—discretion.

1. Under section 772, R. S. of the District of Columbia, every order, judgment or decree, which involves the merits of the action or proceeding, may be the subject of an appeal from the Special to the General Term of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

2. It is immaterial whether a motion for a new trial, based on the ground that the verdict is against the weight of evidence, is within section 804 as a motion to set aside a verdict "for insufficient evidence." This court is, however, of opinion that such motion is within said section, and that the words "insufficient evidence" apply to insufficiency of fact as well as of law.

3. The legal discretion of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, whether sitting at special or general term, in granting or denying motions to set aside verdicts and grant new trials, is not by law submitted to the review of this court. But this court holds, in the case presented, that the plaintiff in error was entitled by law to have that discretion exercised by said court at general term, the order appealed from having denied his motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence.

4. The provisions of the Act of March 3, 1863, establishing the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, with its Special and General Terms, which was taken from the legislation of New York in substantially the same language, are to be construed in the sense in which they were then understood in the system from which they were taken.

Argued April 21, 1887. Decided May 2, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Reversed, Remanded.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Nathaniel Wilson and Walter D. Davidge, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Frank T. Browning and William F. Mattingly, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This an action at law, brought by the defendant in error, in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, against the plaintiff in error, to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants in the management of its cars while running upon a street railroad in the City of Washington. On the trial of the cause, and after the testimony for the plaintiff was closed, the defendant asked the court to instruct the jury that, upon the testimony offered in behalf of the plaintiff, he was not entitled to recover. This was refused and an exception taken. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $5,000, on which judgment was rendered. The defendant thereupon filed a motion for a new trial on the following grounds: (1) because the verdict was [559] against the weight of evidence; (2) because the verdict was against the instructions of the court; (3) because the damages awarded by the jury were excessive; and also upon exceptions taken at the trial.

The record then shows the following proceedings: "The motion for a new trial coming on to be heard upon the pleadings, the testimony and the rulings of the court, as set forth in said pleadings and in the stenographic report filed herewith and marked Exhibit A, which said report contains all the testimony in the case and the rulings of the court, the same is hereby overruled; and from the order of the court overruling said motion the defendant hereby appeals to the court in general term. And thereupon the defendant, by its said attorney, tenders to the court here its bills of exception to the rulings of the court on the trial of this case, and prays that they may be duly signed, sealed, and made a part of the record now for then, which is done accordingly." The bills of exception state the rulings of the court during the progress of the trial with the evidence applicable thereto, and Exhibit A, referred to in the order of the court overruling the motion for a new trial, sets out in full all the testimony in the case.

The record then shows the proceedings and judgment on the appeal in the general term, as follows: "Now again come here as well the plaintiff as the defendant, by their respective attorneys; whereupon, it appearing to the court that the order of the court below overruling the motion for a new trial on a case stated, upon the ground that the verdict of the jury was against the weight of evidence, is not an order from which an appeal lies to this court; and it also appearing to the court that the defendant's exceptions to the admissibility of evidence and to the rulings and instructions of the court were not well taken, the said appeal is hereby dismissed, and the motion for a new trial on exceptions is now overruled, and the judgment of the court is affirmed, with costs."

The defendant below sued out the present [561] writ of error. The assignment of error relied on, and the only one we find it necessary to consider, is that the court in general term refused to entertain the appeal from the action of the court at special term, overruling the motion for a new trial, so far as it was based on the ground that the verdict of the jury was against the weight of evidence, because it was not an order from which an appeal lies from the special to the general term of the court.

The opinion of the court, which is sent up with the record, expressly considers, discusses, and decides all the questions arising on the bills of exception; but no reason is given for that part of the judgment refusing to consider the appeal so far as it rested upon the order of the court at special term, overruling the motion for a new trial, based on the ground that the verdict of the jury was against the weight of evidence. It was said in argument at the bar that this was because, a few weeks before, in the case [562] of Stewart v. Elliott, 2 Mackey, 307, decided March 13, 1883, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia had given a carefully considered opinion concerning the very point in controversy. It was decided in that case that the right of appeal on motions for a new trial from the special to the general term was given only in three cases: (1) where the motion is based on exceptions taken during the progress of the trial; (2) where the verdict has been rendered upon insufficient evidence; and (3) for excessive damages. It was also decided that a verdict against the weight of evidence cannot be said to be a verdict upon insufficient evidence; the term "insufficient evidence," in section 804 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia, being construed as meaning evidence not sufficient in law to support a verdict. It therefore held that a motion for a new trial, because the verdict was against the weight of evidence, is left by the statute entirely within the discretion of the judge at special term trying the case, and that no appeal lies from his determination to the general term.

The sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, affecting the question, are as follows:

"Sec. 753. The several general terms and special terms of the circuit courts, district courts, and criminal courts, authorized by law, are declared to be, severally, terms of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia; and the judgments, decrees, sentences, orders, proceedings, and acts of the general terms, special terms, circuit courts, district courts, and criminal courts rendered, made, or had, are and shall be deemed judgments, decrees, sentences, orders, proceedings, and acts of the supreme court; but nothing contained in this section shall affect the right of appeal, as provided by law.

"Sec. 772. Any party aggrieved by any order, judgment, or decree, made or pronounced at any special term, may, if the same involve the merits of the action or proceeding, appeal therefrom to the general term of the supreme court, and, upon such appeal, the general term [563] shall review such order, judgment, or decree, and affirm, reverse, or modify the same, as shall be just.

* * * * * *

"Sec. 800. Nonenumerated motions in all suits and proceedings at law and in equity shall first be heard and determined at special terms. Suits in equity, not triable by jury, shall also be heard and determined at special terms. But the justice holding such special term may, in his discretion, order any such motion or suit to be heard, in the first instance, at a general term.

* * * * *

"Sec. 803. If, upon the trial of a cause, an exception be taken, it may be reduced to writing at the time, or it may be entered on the minutes of the justice and afterward settled in such manner as may be provided by the rules of the court, and then stated in writing in a case or bill of exceptions, with so much of the evidence as may be material to the questions to be raised; but such case or bill of exceptions need not be sealed or signed.

"Sec. 804. The justice who tries the cause may, in his discretion, entertain a motion, to be made on his minutes, to set aside a verdict and grant a new trial upon exceptions or for insufficient evidence, or for excessive damages; but such motion shall be made at the same term at which the trial was had.

"Sec. 805. When such motion is made and heard upon the minutes, an appeal to the general term may be taken from the decision, in which case a bill of exceptions or case shall be settled in the usual manner.

"Sec. 806. A motion for a new trial on a case or bill of exceptions, and an application for judgment on a special verdict, or a verdict taken subject to the opinion of the court, shall be heard in the first instance at a general term."

The construction given by the court below to section 804 of the Revised Statutes is that it does not limit "the range of reasons for which the new trial might be granted by the judge who heard the cause;" but that "The only purpose of the enumeration in the section was to [564] designate the cases in which an appeal might be taken to the general term from the order of the trial justice refusing a new trial; and this enumeration constituted an effective limitation of the right of appeal to the three cases mentioned; viz., where the motion has been urged either 'upon exceptions, or for insufficient evidence, or for excessive damages.' In no other case was an appeal to be allowed." Stewart v. Elliott, 2 Mackey, 307, 313.

But this construction of the statute overlooks the operation and effect of section 772. By that section an appeal will lie from the special to the general term from any order, judgment or decree, "if the same involve the merits of the action or proceeding." Certainly, motions for a new trial upon grounds other than those recited in section 804 are included in this description. A motion may be made to set aside a verdict and grant a new trial on the ground that the verdict is against law, or against the instructions of the court, or for newly discovered evidence, or because the amount is less than it should have been where the damages are ascertainable by some fixed rule of law, or for misconduct of the jury, or for fraud practiced by the successful party. None of these cases are specifically recited in section 804; and yet, if we adopt the construction put upon that section by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, no appeal can be had from the judgment of a special term in any of them, although they involve the merits of the action or proceeding as completely as any of those mentioned in section 804.

It is the evident purpose and meaning of section 772 to give the right of appeal from the special to the general term from every order, judgment or decree involving the merits of the action or proceeding. There is nothing in the other sections referred to which necessarily limits that right; and any construction of their language which has that effect is unwarranted.

Their object is not to specify the cases in which the action of the special term upon motions for a new trial may be reviewed on appeal by the general term. Section 804 by itself merely provides that the justice who tries the cause at special term may, in his discretion, entertain or refuse to entertain a motion to be made on [565] his minutes to set aside a verdict and grant a new trial for the grounds therein mentioned. If he entertains the motion and hears it, then by section 805 an appeal will lie to the general term from the decision. The form of that appeal is by means of a bill of exceptions or case, which shall be settled in the usual manner. Of course, if the ground of the motion for a new trial is for insufficient evidence, or for excessive damages, the bill of exceptions or case for the appeal must contain a statement of all the evidence offered and received on the trial, because it must bring to the general term all the material necessary to enable it to act upon the appeal precisely as the judge at special term acted upon the motion. If, however, the judge at special term exercises his discretion under section 804, by refusing to entertain the motion for a new trial to be made on his minutes, then the party moving for the new trial may, under section 806, predicate his motion on a case or bill of exceptions, containing, as in the former instance, all the evidence; and in that event the motion shall be heard in the first instance at a general term.

The proper conclusion in reference to motions for a new trial upon other grounds than those specified in section 804 would seem to be that in such cases the justice who tries the cause would have no discretion in reference to entertaining them, but is required to consider them in the first instance of course, with the right of appeal to the general term from his action, as provided by section 772. Section 806 mentions the cases in which the hearing on a motion for a new trial shall be heard in the first instance at a general term. Section 804 provides for cases in which, according to the discretion of the justice who tries the cause, the hearing of the motion may be had before him on his minutes in the first instance at a special term. Section 770 gives authority to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in General Term, to "determine by rule what motions shall be heard at a special term, as nonenumerated motions, and what motions shall be heard at a general term in the first instance." This power of discrimination by rule is, of course, subject to the statutory provisions contained in sections 800, 804, 805 and 806; but in every instance the order, judgment or decree, made or pronounced at any special term, if it involve the merits of the action or proceeding, may be the subject of an appeal to the general term of the supreme court by virtue of section 772. Even in cases of motions not involving the merits, such as nonenumerated motions, which by section 800 it is said "shall first be heard and determined at special terms," it is also provided by the same section that "the justice holding such special term may, in his discretion, order any such motion or suit to be heard in the first instance at a general term."

It may be said that this construction of section 772 renders section 805 superfluous. If the former section, it may be said, secures the right of appeal from every order involving the merits, there was no necessity in section 805 for expressly granting it in the cases therein referred to. If this were true, it could not, we think, limit the operation of section 772. It must have effect according to its express terms and evident meaning; and a reason may be found for the introduction of section 805, as intended, by way of more abundant caution, to exclude a possible contrary conclusion, or to show that the appeal must be upon a bill of exceptions or a case.

If section 805 is construed to limit the appeal to the general term to the particular cases mentioned in section 804, it may with equal force be contended that the enumeration of the particular motions, which by the latter section the justice, at special term, is permitted to entertain, by a necessary implication denies to him the power to consider motions for a new trial based on any other reasons. The language of the section is that the judge, at special term, may in his discretion entertain the motions therein specified. No other section professes to confer power upon the court, at special term, to consider motions for a new trial of any other description. Can it thence be inferred that no such power exists? That conclusion is rejected by common consent. How then can it be said that section 805, which recognizes the right of appeal only in the cases specified in section 804, by implication denies it in every other? It might more plausibly be argued that all other cases, not included in sections 804 and 805, are within the provisions of section 806, and may, in the first instance, be heard at a general term in the form of a case [567] or bill of exceptions, containing the necessary predicates for their support. But the only consistent interpretation to be placed on the whole enactment is that which secures the right of appeal, under section 772, from the special to the general term, in every case of an order, judgment or decree which involves the merits of the action or proceeding, and which is not otherwise specially provided for. The object of sections 804 and 805 seems to be to provide for a special class of cases, in which discretion is given to the justice, at special term, to hear or to refuse to hear motions for a new trial, providing, in the first case, for an appeal in the usual manner, and in the latter case, when he refuses to hear the motion, leaving it to be heard, under section 806, on a case or bill of exceptions, in the first instance, in the general term.

Upon this view of these statutory provisions, it is immaterial whether the motion for a new trial made in this case, so far as it was based on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, is embraced by section 804 as a motion to set aside a verdict for insufficient evidence; because, if it is not, still, as we have seen, an appeal lies by virtue of section 772 from the order of the special term denying the motion, because it involved the merits of the action. Nevertheless, we are of the opinion that the proper construction of section 804 embraces a motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict is against the weight of evidence, as being within the terms "for insufficient evidence," as used in that section.

Upon this point, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in Stewart v. Elliott, 2 Mackey, 307, 315, said: "By a loose use of language, it may be said that a verdict 'contrary to the evidence,' or 'against the weight of evidence,' was rendered upon 'insufficient evidence;' and, on the other hand, that a verdict upon insufficient evidence is one contrary to or against the weight of evidence. But we are dealing with legal expressions in their technical meaning; and it is familiar to all lawyers that evidence offered to a jury in a cause has a twofold sufficiency, i. e., sufficiency in law and sufficiency in fact; that of its sufficiency in law the court is the exclusive judge; its sufficiency [568] in fact is a question exclusively for the jury. The court, in considering the legal sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the case of a suitor, or to establish any particular fact essential to his recovery, must examine the proof with respect to its quality and quantity; and this determination by the court is a question of law. And if the court can see that the proof offered is of such a character and volume that it might well satisfy a rational mind of the truth of the position it is introduced to maintain, then it is declared to be legally sufficient for the purpose; and it must be submitted to the jury, who are the exclusive judges of its sufficiency in fact, whether others may differ from them in their conclusions or not. As expressed in a recent decision in Maryland, following numerous familiar cases, 'if no evidence is offered, or if it is not such as one in reason and fairness could find from it the fact sought to be established, the court ought not to submit the finding of such fact to the jury.' Griffith v. Diffenderfer, 50 Md. 466. To the same effect is the language in 40 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 181, Haipin v. R. R. Co.: 'If there is no conflict, the sufficiency is no longer a question of fact, but becomes a question of law to be determined by the court.' It is to this legal sufficiency that the statute refers when it authorizes the appeal to this court, and to that inquiry alone have we the right to address an examination."

The court in the same opinion uses the following language (p. 314): "There is not the slightest desire upon our part to circumscribe the methods by which, according to the long established practice in this jurisdiction, the losing party may apply in the trial court for a new trial. The courts of justice would lose much of their value unless this mode of redress against unjust verdicts was tenaciously preserved by the judge, to be applied in his discretion where he believed the jury have done manifest injustice by returning a verdict against the weight of the evidence."

We see no reason, however, for supposing that the language in section 804, "for insufficient evidence," is to be limited to evidence in- [569] sufficient in point of law. The words themselves do not import any distinction. It is admitted that according to established rules of procedure in such cases, it is customary and proper for courts of justice, sitting in the trial of causes by jury, to set aside verdicts and grant new trials in both classes of cases; that is, where the verdict rests upon evidence which is either insufficient in law or insufficient in fact. Strictly speaking, evidence is said to be insufficient in law only in those cases where there is a total absence of such proof, either as to its quantity or kind, as in the particular case some rule of law requires as essential to the establishment of the fact. Such, for instance, would be the case where a fact was attested by one witness only, when the law required two; or when the alleged agreement was proven to be verbal, when the law required it to be in writing. In such cases, a verdict might be said to be against law, because founded on insufficient evidence. Insufficiency in point of fact may exist in cases where there is no insufficiency in point of law; that is, there may be some evidence to sustain every element of the case, competent both in quantity and quality in law to sustain it, and yet it may be met by countervailing proof so potent as to leave no reasonable doubt of the opposing conclusion. This is illustrated by the case of Algeo v. Duncan, 39 N. Y. 313. That was an action upon a promissory note, and the plaintiff's prima facie case was fully made out; the defense arose upon a plea of infancy, which was also fully proved, there being no evidence to contradict or discredit the testimony upon that point, and yet the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. In that case it was decided that a motion to set aside the verdict "for insufficient evidence" was properly made and entertained. Judge Woodruff, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The term 'insufficient evidence,' as used in the Code, should be considered with reference to the actual issue upon which the jury were to pass, and not less with reference to the whole state of the case made by the adverse party. Suppose the sole issue in a given case was upon a plea of release. The defendant, having the affirmative of that issue, produces and proves a release under the hand and seal of the plaintiff, and the latter gives no evidence in avoidance of the release sufficient to warrant the submission of any [570] question to the jury, and yet the jury find for the plaintiff. It is true that such a verdict would be against the defendant's conclusive evidence, but it is equally true that such a verdict is without any sufficient evidence."

So upon the whole evidence in the case the testimony in support of the cause of action, or of the defense, may be so slight, although competent in law, or the preponderance against it may be so convincing, that a verdict may be seen to be plainly unreasonable and unjust. In many cases it might be the duty of the court to withdraw the case from the jury, or to direct a verdict in a particular way; and yet, in others, where it would be proper to submit the case to the jury, it might become its duty to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial. That obligation, however, is the result of a conclusion of fact, and in such cases the ground of the ruling is that the verdict is not supported by sufficient evidence, because it is against the weight of the evidence. Therefore it was said by this court in Randall v. Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. 109 U. S. 478 [27: 1003]: "It is the settled law of this court that when the evidence given at the trial, with all inferences that the jury could justifiably draw from it, is insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff, so that such verdict, if returned, must be set aside, the court is not bound to submit the case to the jury, but may direct a verdict for the defendant." In many cases, therefore, the evidence is insufficient in law, because insufficient in fact.

The sections of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia under consideration, it is admitted, were taken substantially from the New York Code of Procedure of 1851, 1852; and it is admitted, also, that, by the construction placed upon the language contained in section 804 by the courts of New York, it includes motions to set aside a verdict against the weight of evidence, as within the phrase "for insufficient evidence." This was the very point determined in the case just referred to, of Algeo v. Duncan, 89 N. Y. 313, and in McDonald v. Walter, 40 N. Y. 551. The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, however, in Stewart v. Elliott, ubi supra, declined to follow [571] these decisions of the New York Courts, because they construed the Code of Procedure of that State so as to conform to the previous well established practice in that State; and it was held that in the District of Columbia the case was widely different, because prior to the adoption of these provisions in the Act of Congress the well established practice in the District of Columbia was that which had always been in force in the State of Maryland. The argument was that in that State the granting or refusal of a motion for a new trial was a matter resting in the discretion of the court, and could not be ground for a writ of error or appeal; and that, consistently with that previous practice, sections 804 and 805 must be construed strictly, so as to limit the appeal originating in them to the cases particularly mentioned.

The language of the court in Stewart v. Elliott, ubi supra, on this point is: "This well settled practice, existing here when the Act of March 3, 1863, was passed, should only be considered as changed by that Act to the extent clearly indicated by its terms; and no latitude of construction can be allowed in the interpretation of a statute framed in derogation of common-law principles. As was said by the court in the case in 24 Howard (Pr.) 211, Allgro v. Duncan, before referred to, it is a safe rule to apply the former practice and interpret the obscurities and deficiences of the Code by the light of that practice."

But the Act of March 3, 1863, "To reorganize the courts in the District of Columbia and for other purposes," 12 Stat. at L. 762, was the introduction into the District of Columbia of a new organization of its judicial system. It established a single court, to be called the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, having general jurisdiction in law and equity. It gave to that court the same jurisdiction as was then possessed and exercised by the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, and to the justices of the new court the powers and jurisdiction of the judges of the circuit court. It also gave to each of the justices of the court power to hold a District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, with all the powers and jurisdiction of other District Courts of the United States; and also to hold a criminal court for the trial of all crimes and offenses [572] arising within the District, with the same powers and jurisdiction as was then possessed and exercised by the Criminal Court of the District of Columbia. All the courts, therefore, previously existing in the District of Columbia, as separate and independent tribunals, having special and diverse jurisdictions, were consolidated into the new Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. The arrangement of that court, for purposes of convenience and dispatch of business, into general and special terms, was taken from the system long previously established and known in the State of New York in reference to its supreme court; and, for the purpose of determining the relation of the special to the general term, the Act of Congress of March 3, 1863, adopted the provisions from the legislation of New York incorporated into the sections of the Revised Statutes now under consideration.

Instead of construing these new statutory provisions in the light of the jurisprudence of Maryland previously prevailing in the District in reference to this subject, we think that when Congress reorganized the judicial system of the District, by abolishing the old courts and by establishing the present Supreme Court of the District, with its General and Special Terms, and adopted them from the legislation of New York in substantially the same language, these provisions are to be construed in the sense in which they were understood at the time in that system from which they were taken. In other words, we think that Congress adopted for this purpose the law of New York as it was understood in New York. McDonald v. Hovey, 110 U. S. 619 [28:269].

It follows, therefore, that the previous practice of the courts of Maryland, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in reference to writs of error to and appeals from the former Circuit Court of this District, are not entitled to the weight which was given to them by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in Stewart v. Elliott, ubi supra, and in their judgment in this case. It is true that motions to grant a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence, are, in a certain sense, addressed [573] to the discretion of the court, and can be more satisfactorily dealt with by the judge who tried the cause and who had the opportunity of seeing the witnesses and hearing them testify. And this furnishes one of the reasons why ordinarily a writ of error or an appeal will not lie for the purpose of revising and controlling the exercise of that discretion by an appellate tribunal; yet in some of the States a contrary practice prevails, and a writ of error is authorized to bring up for review the proceedings and judgment of an inferior court, on which it may be assigned as an error in law, upon a bill of exceptions setting forth the whole evidence, that the court below erred in not granting a new trial because the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. Such a practice in the appellate courts of the United States is perhaps forbidden by the Seventh Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, declaring that "No fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law." But that rule is not applicable as between the Special and General Terms of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia as now organized. The appeal from the special to the general term is not an appeal from one court to another, but is simply a step in the progress of the cause during its pendency in the same court. The supreme court sitting at special term and the supreme court sitting in the general term, though the judges may differ, is the same tribunal. It is quite true, nevertheless, that the judge sitting at special term, on the trial of a cause by a jury, is, from the nature of the case, better qualified (because he sees the witnesses and hears them testify), to judge whether the verdict is warranted by the evidence, than other judges, even of the same court, who are called in to decide the same question upon a report of the testimony in writing; and where the question comes up in general term, on an appeal, all proper allowance will be made, in its consideration, for that difference, and its due weight given to the order of the judge at special term denying the motion.

[574] The difficulty in the way of a satisfactory judgment on the appeal is, therefore, not to be considered as insuperable; in fact, it applies equally to the case of motions for a new trial based on the ground that the damages allowed by the verdict are excessive, which presents purely a question of fact, not determinable by any fixed and certain rule of law. It will apply also in many cases where the ground of the motion is that the verdict is not sustained by evidence sufficient in law, for in one aspect that may involve questions of fact. That would be a proper form of motion in cases where, although there is some testimony to support the conclusion, it is so slight that the judge trying the case would be legally justified in instructing the jury to return a verdict the other way; and although in such cases it is said to be a question of law, it nevertheless involves an estimate on the part of the court of the force and efficacy of the evidence.

It is our opinion, therefore, that the Supreme Court of the District at General Term erred in dismissing the appeal from the order at special term denying the motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. It should have entertained and considered the appeal on that ground.

It is urged in argument, however, that the error did not prejudice the plaintiff in error, because the court necessarily passed upon the same matter in considering and sustaining the ruling of the court at special term in refusing to instruct the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant upon the evidence offered by the plaintiff; but the question arising on this ruling, and that on the motion for a new trial at the conclusion of the whole evidence, were not identical. It might well be that on the plaintiff's evidence there was a case sufficiently made out to submit to the jury, while on the whole testimony it might fairly be a question whether the verdict was not against the weight of the evidence, in that sense which would justify the court in granting a new trial. Of course nothing we have said in this opinion is to be construed as indicating any rule of decision in such cases, or is intended in the least to narrow the province of the jury as the proper tribunal for determining questions of fact in [575] trials at common law. The relation of the court to the jury, together constituting the appointed tribunal for the administration of the law in such cases, is regulated by fixed and settled maxims. The legal discretion of the Supreme Court of the District, whether sitting at general or special term, in granting or denying motions to set aside verdicts and grant new trials, is not by law submitted to the review of this court. The only point in judgment here is that the plaintiff in error was entitled by law to have that discretion exercised by the supreme court at general term, and that that court committed an error of law in refusing to consider his appeal from the order at special term denying his motion for a new trial, based on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence.

For this error, the judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia at General Term is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to take further proceedings therein in conformity with this opinion.

AMERICAN PRESSED TAN BARK COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 575–600.)

Contract for the construction of machinery—breach—partnership—agency—delay—modification of contract—counterclaim—recoupment—estoppel—expert witness—competency.

In an action to recover damages for the alleged breach by the defendants of a contract for the construction and erection by them of certain machinery for pressing tan bark, upon a steamboat, it is held: that the instructions given by the court below on the question whether the defendants contracted as partners, or as the representatives and agents of a corporation, were proper and as favorable to them as could be required; that the court committed no error in giving and refusing various other instructions, which appear in the opinion of the court; that, if the defendants proceeded under the contract, although there was a delay in preparing the boat to receive the machinery, they were bound to complete the work within the length of time contemplated by the original agreement, and such additional time as was lost by the delay in the construction of the boat; that the contract of March 30, 1882, was not substituted for the original contract of June 23, 1881, but merely waived the provision of said original contract in regard to the time required for pressing and delivering each bale; that the defendants cannot claim any balance due on account of the contract for the machinery, or on account of any other contract, as they did not in their pleadings set up any counterclaim or right of recoupment; and that an objection to the competency of the testimony of a certain witness, as an expert, was properly overruled, the question as to the weight of his evidence being for the jury, in view of his testimony as to his experience.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio.

Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. George Hoadly, T. D. Lincoln, Edgar M. Johnson, Edward Colston, George

Hoadly, Jr., C. H. Stephens and J. L. Lincoln, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Thomas McDougall and E. W. Kittredge, for defendant in error.

This is an action at law, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, by the American Pressed Tan Bark Company, a New Jersey corporation, against Theodore J. McGowan, and Robert C. Bliss, partners under the firm name of "The McGowan Pump Company," doing business at Cincinnati, Ohio, to recover damages for the alleged breach by the defendants of a contract for the construction and erection of machinery upon a steamboat. The petition by which the action was commenced sets forth a contract entered into on the 23d of June, 1881. After a trial before a jury, which occupied thirty days, there was a verdict for the plaintiff for $18,000, and a judgment accordingly, to review which the defendants have brought a writ of error.

The petition alleges that the plaintiff, being the owner of patents for the manufacture and sale of pressed tan bark, entered into a contract with one Mack, of Cincinnati, for the construction of a steamboat which was to receive, carry, and operate machinery to be erected on it by the defendants under the contract sued upon, and was to be constructed, by agreement with the defendants, under their control and supervision, and to their acceptance; and that the boat was so constructed by Mack and was accepted by the defendants. The contract be-[577] tween the plaintiff and Mack for the construction of the boat was in writing, and was made on the 17th of June, 1881. It contained the particulars as to the size and material and mode of construction of the boat, and stated that its construction and acceptance on the part of the plaintiff was left with "Theo. J. McGowan & Bliss," and that it was to be finished and delivered, afloat, to the plaintiff, on or before August 26, 1881. The petition alleges that this contract with Mack was made with full knowledge on the part of the defendants of the purpose for which the boat was being constructed, and with their direction, counsel and advice.

The written papers constituting the contract between the plaintiff and defendants were as follows: On the 23d of April, 1881, the defendants, using the signature "Theo. J. McGowan & Bliss," wrote from Cincinnati to A. G. Darwin, the president of the plaintiff, the following letter:

"CIN'TI, O., APRIL 23d, 1881.

"A. G. Darwin:

"DEAR SIR: We herewith submit plan for bark press, two views, one plan and the other elevation. They were gotten up in great haste and are not as full as they should be, but they show what our ideas are. The operation is 2 12" hyd. presses, E E, one on each side of 20" hyd. press D, to remove the bark from containing cyl. G, alternately, after being pressed in 20" hyd. press D. They pass from the hyd. press E to hyd. press D by a track, and are filled at top end from floor above, and the bale is also delivered from top end of containing cyl. on to the floor from which cylinders are filled. F is a chamber 40" in diameter and 12 feet high, and is supplied with water and air by steam pump A, which keeps up a pressure in F to 300 lbs., to operate the hyd. presses rapid at beginning of the operation, and, when the hyd. pumps B and C have raised the pressure in hyd. press beyond 300 lbs., the check valves close and shut off connection between hyd. presses and pressure chamber. Then the hyd. pumps B and C complete the pressure until bale is pressed in 20" press and bale removed from containing cyl. The hyd. pump C is used exclusively for 20" hyd. press, and hyd. pump B is used for the two 12" presses E E. The hyd. pumps are independent of each other, [578] and each has its own steam cyl. The steam pumps use the water over again from tank from which it has been delivered from hyd. presses. The operation is about as follows: The containing cyl. is filled from upper floor, is run under 20" press and pressed up to desired pressure; it is then run on track to 12" press, where it is forced from containing cyl., which is again filled and operation repeated, and, while cyl. is being emptied the other is going through 20" press, and so on; work is done very rapidly and well. 20" press can be used up to 1,500 tons pressure.

"Trusting this hurried explanation is satisfactory and that we may have your favors,

"Yours, &c., THEO. J. MCGOWAN & BLISS.

"P. S.—Time required for each pressing and delivery of bale 2½ minutes. We guarantee the whole."

On the 20th of May, 1881, the following letter, signed "The McGowan Pump Co.," was written to Darwin:

"CINCINNATI, O., May, 20th, 1881.

"A. G. D., Chicago:

"Yours 18th to hand, and contents noted. By enlarging press, as per your suggestion (which we think very good), we are of opinion that we have large surplus power in presses, and almost agree with you in your ideas as to amount, but we are inexperienced with the nature of tan bark to press into a cylinder and remove therefrom, and have been governed entirely by the calculations given us by Mr. Hill, and we think there will have to be some little experimenting before you can accomplish just what you want. We do not know how much compression there will be to make bale and weight required, nor how bulky the bark will be, when loose, to make bale of required size. We do know the motions can be made in 2½ minutes and the pressure 1,500 tons given, but what kind of bale it will be we do not know. We [579] are constructing this machinery to make these bales 14" x 16", and not much clearance. We think it would be advisable to have more clearance made, by extending columns further out, to permit a large bale being made, by enlarging cylinder, as you suggest. This would necessarily make the press cost more money. The bars would have to be extended further out and the castings make heavier to resist pressure. If you come to the conclusion to have enlargement made, notify us at the earliest moment possible. We have now got scale drawings about complete, and, when the boat is procured, or other selection made for erection, we will have to add to our plan the supports for the support of presses to foundations. It will materially change our plans if changed from boat to land, as presses are very long, and on a shallow boat would throw them above main deck. We will be glad to see you.

"THE McGOWAN PUMP CO."

On the 23d of June, 1881, the following written contract was executed:

"CINCINNATI, O., June 23d, 1881.

"The Am'r. Pressed Tan Bark Co., of 240 Broadway, New York.

"GENTLEMEN: We hereby propose to furnish you the following machinery:

"1. 14" x 24" engine and all necessary trimmings for grinding bark.

"2. 14" x 28" engine and all necessary trimmings for propelling boat.

"3. 3 boilers, 42" x 26", and all necessary trimmings for propelling boat.

"3 bark mills and all necessary trimmings and gearing.

"1 bark elevator, 2 elevators with platforms, for raising and lowering pressed bark to and from hold of boats, to be provided with safety catches and unwinding device; 3 heaters—1 for bark engines, 1 for boat engines, and 1 for steam pumps; 1 steam pump for boiler feed; 1 deck hand pump; 250 feet of rubber hose, couplings, and 3 nozzles; 2 hoppers and scales [580] to weigh bark; all the necessary shafting, hangers, pulleys, beltings, and all steam and escape pipes; also one 20" hyd. press and two 12" hyd. presses, with their necessary fixtures and connections, together with the necessary hyd. steam pumps, tank, etc., for pressing bark into bales; all to be done in a workmanlike manner and of first class material, and set up aboard your boat in Cincinnati, Ohio, for the sum of twenty-three thousand seven hundred ($23,700) dollars; the above machinery to have a sufficient capacity to do the required work, and guaranteed to pass government inspection.

"THE McGOWAN PUMP CO.

"To be completed in 60 days.

"We accept the above.

"Accepted June 23, 1881.

"AM'R. TAN BARK CO.,

"By S. H. BEACH, Att'y."

On the 30th of June, 1881, the following letter was written by Darwin to "The McGowan Pump Co.:"

"NEW YORK, June 30, 1881.

"To the McGowan Pump Co., Cin'ti, Ohio.

"Mr. S. H. Beach hands us contract for presses, engines, boilers, etc., etc., entirely satisfactory, as we understand—that is, that the capacity of the presses, etc., are in keeping with guarantee expressed in your letter of April 23, 1881, which we consider a part of your contract, in so far as guarantee of the presses are concerned. Please give us formal acknowledgment of the same.

"Yours Respectfully, A. G. DARWIN,

"Pres't A. P. T. B. Co."

On the 5th of July, 1881, the following letter was written by the McGowan Pump Co. to Darwin:

"CINCINNATI, OHIO, July 5, 1881.

"A. G. Darwin, N. Y.

"DEAR SIR: Your favor of June 30th to hand and noted. Our contract is in accord with ours of April 23. Of course we do not know nor could we guarantee anything in reference [581] to whether the bark will bale or not, or weight or size of bale. That we consider an experiment, and can only be demonstrated by test.

"Yours Respectfully,

THE McGOWAN PUMP CO."

At the trial, the plaintiff offered evidence, in connection with the contract with Mack, tending to prove that that contract was drawn up in the office of the defendants, and read over by the parties before it was signed, in the presence of the defendants, and was left in their safe until sometime in November, 1881, when the boat was launched by Mack; and evidence tending to show that the defendants agreed to superintend the erection and construction of the boat, and took upon themselves the supervision and control of the same, and undertook to accept the same, for the plaintiff; that the boat was constructed for the purpose of receiving and operating the machinery of the defendants, according to plans of construction discussed between the agents of the plaintiff and Mack, and the defendants, and approved by the defendants; and that the defendants did superintend the construction of the boat and accept the same.

The petition alleges that the contract of the 23d of June, 1881, was a contract whereby the defendants agreed and guarantied to construct, erect, complete and have in operation on board of the boat, within sixty days from the date of the contract, the machinery specified in it, for the purpose of pressing tan bark under the patented process, and according to plans, specifications and details furnished by the defendants; and that the defendants guarantied that all of the machinery should be done in a workmanlike manner and of first class material, and set up on board of the boat at Cincinnati, and that all of said machinery should have sufficient capacity to do, and would do, the required work, and would pass government inspection, and that the hydraulic machinery would sustain and work up to a pressure of 1,500 tons, and that the time necessary for pressing and delivering each bale of bark would be 2½ minutes.

The breach alleged in the petition is that the [582] defendants have failed to construct, erect and complete the machinery according to the contract, and have failed to erect and complete it within the time set forth in the contract; that the machinery constructed and erected on board of the boat by the defendants is of insufficient and inferior material, is inferior and defective in character and quality of workmanship, and fails to do the work required by the contract; and that the hydraulic machinery constructed will not give, sustain or work up to the 1,500 tons pressure as guarantied by the defendants, and is defective in workmanship and unsafe. The petition further alleges that the plaintiff has wholly performed on its part the contract of the 23d of June, 1881, and paid to the defendants, on account of the $23,700 to be paid thereby, the following sums, at the following dates: November 5, 1881, $4,500; November 26, 1881, $2,500; January 24, 1882, $3,000; February 28, 1882, $2,500; and March 30, 1882, $4,000; making a total of $16,500.

The defendants put in an answer, denying generally the averments of the petition, on which the case went to trial. On the third day of the trial, by leave of the court, the defendants filed an amendment to their answer, in the following language:

"Second defense. These defendants, protesting that the contract dated June 23, 1881, described in the petition, was not made with them, but with the McGowan Pump Company, a corporation of Ohio, say: that if it shall appear, upon the trial of this cause, that the contract was made with them as partners, under the name of the McGowan Pump Company, and not with said Corporation, then they say that said contract, as made June 23, 1881, did not provide, as a part of said contract, that the hydraulic machinery would sustain and work up to a pressure of fifteen hundred tons, or that the time necessary for pressing and delivering each bale of bark would be two and a half minutes, as alleged in said petition. The defendants say that said contract, as originally executed, contained neither of said provisions, and that, if it shall appear that, by a subsequent modification of said contract, such provisions [583] were added to and became a part of said contract, then they say that the same were wholly without consideration.

"Thirdly. And for a further defense in this behalf, these defendants, protesting that the contract, dated June 23, 1881, described in the petition, was made with the McGowan Pump Company, a corporation of Ohio, say that if it shall appear, upon the trial of this cause, that it was made with them as partners, under the name of the McGowan Pump Company, then, that on and before the 30th day of March, 1882, extra work, not required by said contract, to the amount of fifteen hundred and eighty-two dollars and fifty-one cents, had been furnished to the said American Tan Bark Company, being the same extras described in the contract hereinafter copied, and that, in consideration of the transfer to the American Pressed Tan Bark Company of all the machinery embodied in the said contract of June 23, 1881, and said extras, with receipts in full for all material and machinery furnished T. G. McGowan and Bliss by other parties for steamer Tan Bark, the said contract of June 23, 1881, has been wholly released and discharged, and other terms of agreement substituted therefor, by reason of the fact that, on the 30th day of March, 1882, a contract was executed and delivered by and between the parties to the contract of June 23, 1881; viz., the McGowan Pump Company and the American Pressed Tan Bark Company, and which contract of March 30, 1882, if it shall turn out that it was made by the defendants as a partnership, under the name of the McGowan Pump Company, was made and delivered for the benefit of the same McGowan Pump Company which executed the contract of June 23, 1881, which contract is still in full force and binding between the parties, and is in the words and figures following to wit:

'CINCINNATI, O., March 30, 1882.

'In consideration of 11,200 dollars to be paid us we hereby transfer to the American Pressed Tan Bark Company of New York all the machinery embodied in our contract, and extras, with receipts in full for all material and [584] mach'y furnished T. J. McGowan & Bliss by other parties for steamer 'Tan Bark.' The terms of this sale are as follows: To continue all former agreements and guaranties, except time required to press bark into bales and removal from cylinders. We further agree to transfer to said Co. all special patterns made for our hyd. machinery, and also agree to transfer to said Co. our exclusive interest in the accumulator and double-end arrangement on hyd. press for bark purposes only. It is hereby agreed that the above guaranty, covering hyd. mach'y, extends only to the strength of material only up to the fifteen hundred tons pressure. We hereby acknowledge receipt of four thousand dollars; balance to be paid on presentation of receipts, as above.

'All erasures and changes made before signing.

THE MCGOWAN PUMP CO.
AMERICAN PRESSED TAN BARK CO.
By S. H. BEACH, Attorney.'

"And the defendants further say that the four thousand dollars described in the petition as paid on the 30th day of March, 1882, was paid to the said McGowan Pump Company under and in pursuance of the said contract of March 30, 1882, at the date of its execution, and is the same sum therein named and receipted for, but that no further or other payments have been made under said contract, although the same has been wholly complied with by the said McGowan Pump Company.

"Fourthly. And by way of a fourth defense in this cause, the defendants, protesting that the said contract of June 23, 1881, was made by the McGowan Pump Company, a corporation of Ohio, and not with the defendants as partners under the name of the McGowan Pump Company, nevertheless, if it shall prove, upon the trial of this cause, that it was made with them in such partnership capacity, by way of further defense, say: that in the month of March, 1882, the defendants took possession of and accepted the machinery constructed upon the said steamer 'Tan Bark,' as and for full performance of said contract, and waived any claim for further performance thereof, and have prevented the defendants from making further performance thereof, if such were [585] necessary, which the defendants deny, by taking the same into their exclusive custody and possession, and have made divers and sundry changes in said machinery themselves, so as to prevent and render impossible any further performance thereof, if any such were necessary under said contract, and have employed the McGowan Pump Company of Cincinnati, Ohio, being the same Company which entered into the contract of June 23, 1881, described in the petition, to do work to be used in making other changes and alterations, which last named work done by the McGowan Pump Company, and which, if said Company turn out to have been a partnership, was done by the defendants as such partnership, amounts to the sums of $1,384.96 and $146.50, for which an action is now pending against the said plaintiff on behalf of the said McGowan Pump Company, as aforesaid; and said defendants have removed said steamer 'Tan Bark,' and all said machinery so altered, from the jurisdiction of this court and into the State of Tennessee, where the same now is, and have appropriated the same to their own use."

The plaintiff put in a reply to this amended answer. In regard to the second defense, the reply denies that the provisions of the contract, that the hydraulic machinery would sustain and work up to a pressure of 1,500 tons, or that the time necessary for pressing and delivering each bale of bark would be two and a half minutes, were without consideration, and denies the other allegations of the second defense. As to the third defense, it alleges that the instrument of the 30th of March, 1882, was executed by it on the faith of representations made to it by the defendants that they had operated and tested the hydraulic machinery up to a pressure of 1,000 tons, and that the bales of bark pressed by them on the trial of the machinery made by them on the 27th of March, 1882, had received a pressure of 1,000 tons therefrom, and that the machinery as so constructed had been operated by the defendants under said pressure of 1,000 tons; that those representations were untrue; that had the plaintiff known that fact, it would not have executed the instrument; that, on discovering the untruth of the representations, it immedi-[586] ately notified the defendants that the agreement set forth in the instrument was null and void; that the same was thereupon abandoned by the parties thereto; and that the hydraulic machinery never has worked, and never will work, up to a pressure of 1,500 tons, and wholly fails to comply with the agreements and guaranties made by the defendants. It denies the other allegations of the third defense. As to the fourth defense, it avers that, after the defendants refused to do any further work on the machinery, it made, at heavy expense, alterations in it to make it operative.

The bill of exceptions states that the plaintiff gave evidence "tending to prove that the defendants were partners under, and signed, the name of T. J. McGowan & Bliss and The McGowan Pump Company, and tending to show that, at the time the contract of June 23 was signed, the defendants, upon being asked the reason for using the name of The McGowan Pump Company, said it was to retain the old name;" also, that the plaintiff gave evidence "tending to show defendants had negotiated with plaintiff as a firm, under the name of The McGowan Pump Company, prior to June 23, 1881, and that the defendants contracted with the plaintiff June 23, 1881, as a firm, under the name of The McGowan Pump Company, and that all the plaintiff's dealings with the defendants were as such partnership;" and evidence tending to show that the plaintiff was a Corporation duly organized under the laws of New Jersey, and owned valuable patents for the grinding and pressing of tan bark, which it expected to utilize in this machinery and the use thereof; and evidence tending to show "that the machinery named in the said contract of June 23, 1881, was not completely finished and put upon the said boat within the sixty days named in said contract, nor for a long time thereafter, and that, when completed, it was of insufficient material, and not of sufficient power or strength to press a bale of tan bark with a pressure of fifteen hundred tons in two and one half minutes, nor within any time; that the entire machinery was wholly insufficient to accomplish the purpose for which it was constructed, and was very rough, [587] and was made in an unworkmanlike manner; that, in consequence thereof, it suffered great delay in the use of the said boat and machinery, and great damage in having to expend a large sum of money upon the same; and that it lost a very large sum of money by the breach of the said contract before it was finished, and after that, because of the insufficiency of the said machinery and its defective character."

The contract of March 30, 1882, was in the words set forth in the third defense in the amendment to the answer. The plaintiff gave evidence tending to show that it had prior to the 30th of March, 1882, paid to the defendants, on account of the machinery and work, $12,500; that, a few days after signing the last named contract, it paid the $4,000 named therein; that no machinery had been put in the boat on the 10th of November, 1881; and that there was nothing ready on the boat by December 5, 1881; and evidence tending to show that, after it took possession of the boat and machinery, it made additions thereto, costing some $1,200, a part of which the defendants did for it under a written contract of the 19th of April, 1882, mentioned hereafter.

The bill of exceptions also contains the following statements: "The plaintiff offered evidence of experts tending to show that the machinery and material of which it was constructed was poor and insufficient to sustain the required pressure, and, upon cross examination upon this point, the said witnesses gave evidence tending to show that a single hydraulic cylinder could not be made of cast iron so as to bear 1,500 tons pressure; that the water would permeate and pass through the iron; and upon examination by the court, evidence tending to prove that it was not practicable to get such pressure with one cylinder of the kind, but that it might be done with three cylinders, of a pressure of 500 tons each upon one platen; and, on further cross examination, they gave evidence tending to show that water would force itself through cast iron at 700 tons pressure, that cast iron is not safe for more than 600 tons. And the plaintiff gave evidence tending to show that the machinery was only of the value of scrap. The plaintiff also gave evidence tending to show that, at and before the contract of March 30, 1882, was entered [588] into, McGowan had stated that he had had a pressure, on previous tests, of 800 to 1,000 tons on the machinery in pressing bark, and that said representations were false, and that plaintiff was thereby induced to enter into said agreement. Plaintiff gave evidence tending to show that the defendants had tested the machinery, and it was found defective, on the 27th of March, 1882, before the execution of the contract of March 30; and defendants gave evidence tending to show the contrary, and that they made no false representations, and that plaintiff knew, from its employés present at the test, what pressure it bore at the time, and reported to the plaintiff that it had never borne a pressure of over 400 tons, and that there was no more on it at that time. They gave evidence tending to show that McGowan claimed that the failure of the machinery was caused by the insufficient foundations of the boat, because the machinery was not adapted to the boat; that they had done all that was practicable, under the condition of the boat upon which the machinery was to be placed. But the plaintiff gave evidence tending, on the contrary, to show that it was practicable to construct such machinery of cast iron and place it upon said boat." "The defendants offered evidence tending to show that any such boat with machinery upon it had never before been known and used; that it had in no way been tested; and that it was an experiment. They also offered evidence tending to show that the plaintiff had possession of the said boat immediately after she came off the ways, on or about the first of November, 1881, and received the boat from Mack, and that it had witnessed experiments of pressing bark made with the machinery in January, February and March, 1882, and was familiar with the condition, strength and workmanship of the same before entering into the contract of March 30, 1882, and had knowledge before that of the amount of pressure which the defendants had used thereon." "The defendants offered evidence tending to show that they were not boat builders, had no knowledge of boats or of boat building, as the plaintiff knew, and that defendants refused to take any responsibility about the boat, and had [589] nothing to do with planning, constructing, supervising, accepting, or controlling it or its foundations; that they supposed Mr. Mack would attend to that; that the boat was not launched or presented for the machinery until November, 1881; that they supposed, when they commenced to put the machinery upon it, that it would be sufficiently strong; that the foundations, as they proceeded, proved wholly insufficient for that purpose, being too weak; that they reported it to the plaintiff's agent; that he said to them to go ahead and put it on and he would guaranty that they would stand; that the defects in the boat and the bad management of the machinery by the plaintiff caused all the difficulty and breakage in the machinery, and all the expense in repairing; and, in addition thereto, the defendants also offered proof tending to show that the boat was not ready for their work until about the 10th of November, 1881, and that they used due diligence in the manufacture of the machinery and in putting it upon the boat, and that the delay therein was due to the delay in finishing the boat and in the character of the boat when presented for the machinery to be put upon the same. They also offered proof tending to show that the material of which the said machinery was constructed was of sufficient strength to work 1,500 tons and more. They also offered proof tending to show that, in March and April, 1882, the plaintiff took possession and control of said machinery, and that it was built and set up on its boat by the defendants under the contract of June 23, 1881, and afterwards, to make it more perfect, effectual, and useful, entered into the contract of April 19, 1882, with the defendants, and the defendants furnished the labor and the material provided for in said contract and that the plaintiff used it on their boat. The defendants also gave evidence tending to show that the machinery for pressing the bark was constructed of the very best cast iron, and that that was the only material of which said machinery is ever constructed; that the same was of the very highest and best character, and that the workmen upon it and the workmanship were of the highest and best character, and that they endeavored in every way they could to make this machinery as strong and as well as it could be made. They also offered evidence tending to [590] show that, after the boat was launched and ready for the machinery, they proceeded to put the machinery upon the boat, and thereafter they worked with due diligence in putting the same upon the said boat. The defendants also offered proof tending to show that they had fulfilled their contract and were not liable for any damage to the plaintiff, but, on the contrary, the plaintiff owed them for said work, and under the agreement of March 30, 1882, the sum of $8,731.46. The defendants also offered evidence tending to show that they never examined Mack's contract, and that there was nothing said about the character of the foundations of such machinery; that they supposed that, Mack being a boat builder, he knew what foundations for the machinery would be necessary. They also gave evidence tending to show that the McGowan Pump Company was a corporation at the time of entering into the contract of June 23, 1881, and was so acting in making the contract, and that the plaintiff was so informed of it before the signing of the contract." "They also offered evidence tending to show that the boat was not constructed to carry freight or passengers, and the propelling machinery was to be plain, unornamented machinery, to propel the boat from landing to landing at a rate of from two to two and a half miles per hour, and that, on her trip to Paducah and her trial trip up stream, she did more than that."

"All the letters of defendants, copies of which are attached in the exhibits, had the following letter head printed on them:

'Senior partner of late McGowan Bros.
'Manufacturers of railroad water station supplies, water columns, tank valves, steam and power pumps, wrought and cast iron pipe, etc.

being the printed letter head that was in use [591]
prior to June 20, 1881, except" the letter of April 23, 1881, which had the same letter head omitting the word "The" before "McGowan Pump Co.," and a letter dated May 8, 1881, signed "The McGowan Pump Company," and addressed to Darwin. The bill of exceptions does not purport to set forth all the evidence that was given at the trial.

After the verdict and before judgment the defendants moved for a new trial, and, in case it should not be granted, then in arrest of judgment, and, in case neither of such motions was granted, then to restrain the issuing of execution in this case to the amount which should remain after making the deduction of the amount sued for in the suit mentioned in the fourth defense in the amendment to the answer. These motions were denied, and the defendants excepted.

The first error assigned relates to the question whether the contract of June 23, 1881, was made by the defendants as copartners, or was made by a corporation called "The McGowan Pump Company." If by the latter, the action must fail.

The court under exceptions by the defendants, gave the following instructions to the jury:

"1. If the jury find from the evidence that defendants, prior to the making of the contract of June 23, 1881, held themselves out to plaintiff as partners, and that plaintiff dealt with them as such prior to the making of said contract, and entered into said contract believing them to be a firm, and without notice of a corporation, then said defendants are liable on said contract, even though they should find that defendants were not in fact a firm, and that there was a corporation called 'The McGowan Pump Company.'

"2. If the jury find, from the evidence, that the defendants were, prior to June 23, 1881, doing business as partners under the name of 'The McGowan Pump Company' or 'McGowan Pump Co.,' and that plaintiff dealt with them before said date as such partners, and had no knowledge of any change in said business, then said contract is the contract of defendants, and defendants cannot avoid or escape liability [592] thereon, even if on that date a corporation existed called 'The McGowan Pump Company,' with which defendants may have been connected, and to which they had turned over their entire partnership business and assets."

The court also charged the jury as follows on the question of partnership, no part of which charge was excepted to by the defendants:

"The plaintiff has sued the defendants as partners, and can recover against them only as individuals, jointly, equally, and severally liable upon their contract. The two defendants McGowan and Bliss, undeniably negotiated and executed the contract, but whether as individuals, or as the representatives and agents of a corporation, is a question you are to determine. On the facts of this case, which are not disputed, the law charges them as partners, in their liability on the contract with the plaintiff, unless they have established by proof that they were, in making the contract, only the agents of a corporation, and disclosed their agency to the plaintiff, or that this in fact was otherwise known to the plaintiff. It is wholly immaterial, if they were in fact partners, or held themselves out to the plaintiff as partners, which is precisely the same thing as if they were partners in fact, by what name they did their business or made this contract; whether they were known or contracted as 'Theodore J. McGowan & Bliss,' as 'McGowan Pump Company,' or as 'The McGowan Pump Company,' or whether they used any or all of these names indifferently or interchangeably. Now, if they held themselves out to the plaintiff as partners, it is unimportant whether they were a corporation or not in fact. Your inquiries are: (1) Were they partners in fact in making this contract? If so, they would be liable as partners. (2) Did they hold themselves out to the plaintiff as partners? If so, they would be liable in that relation. (3) Were they in fact the authorized agents or representatives of a corporation competent to contract as a corporation, or did they assume to be so authorized, and in that representative capacity make this contract? If so, they cannot be held as partners, provided they disclosed their agency to the agents acting about this business for the plaintiff Corporation; namely, Darwin, Beach, or Hill, or any of them, or if these [593] agents of the plaintiff Corporation otherwise knew that fact. If the jury find that, on the 23d of June, 1881, there was in existence a corporation called 'The McGowan Pump Company,' qualified to do business, when the contract of that date was signed in that name, and that the defendants were authorized to act for it, and informed Beach that it was that Corporation making the contract, the verdict must be for the defendants, because the Corporation is not here sued. And in ascertaining whether the Corporation existed in fact, if you find that the entire amount of capital stock of 'The McGowan Pump Company' was subscribed, and the subscribers met and elected directors, and the directors elected Theodore J. McGowan president and Robert C. Bliss secretary, and said president and secretary made the contract of June 23, 1881, in the name of 'The McGowan Pump Company,' and informed the agent of the plaintiff at the time that 'The McGowan Pump Company' was a corporation, and was contracting in that capacity, then the defendants are entitled to a verdict, notwithstanding it may appear to the jury that the subscribers to the articles of incorporation failed to certify to the Secretary of State, as required by law, that said subscription of stock had been made. But, as a corporation in Ohio can only act by or under the authority of its board of directors, and on the 23d June, 1881, there is no evidence tending to show any action of the board of the Corporation known as the McGowan Pump Company authorizing the contract in this case to be made, and authorizing either McGowan or Bliss to contract for the Corporation, you should consider the fact that they had no such authority on that date to make a contract for the Corporation, in determining whether they did in fact undertake to contract for the Corporation, and whether the signature to said contract was the signature of the Corporation or of the defendants as partners. But, while you should give this fact its due weight, also the fact that the final organization sought to be proved was only a few days prior to the contract, together with all the other facts relating to the formation of the Corporation, it is proper to say that, in the opinion of the court, the want of direct authority conferred by a board of directors [59 would not, in this controversy, so affect the contract as to convert it into one of partnership, because that is a question between the Corporation and its officers assuming to act for it; wherefore, if you find that, notwithstanding this want of authority, the defendants assumed, in their corporate capacity, to contract with the plaintiff, and notified Beach that they were so assuming to act, or he otherwise knew it, your verdict must be for the defendants, irrespective of any want of authority. This point of notifying Beach is one of direct conflict of testimony between the parties, which you must settle under the rules to be hereafter mentioned, the court being content to say here that it is a matter in this lawsuit of paramount importance to both parties, which demands your most careful consideration. In determining these questions submitted to you on this branch of the case you may look to all the facts in proof having any bearing on the questions." "I invite your attention to certain features of the evidence on this branch of the case. From the origin of the transaction in controversy in this case, found in Darwin's letter of March 12, 1881, and even prior to that time, as shown by the defendants' dealings with him as president of another company, it is undisputed that the defendants dealt, in the negotiations with the plaintiff's agent, as partners, no matter under what name, until, at the very earliest, about the 20th May, when the alleged transfer of assets to the Corporation is said to have taken place; and it may be you will find, in the disputed facts, that they so dealt down to about June 20, 1881, when the minutes of corporate organization, in proof, show that a more complete organization was attempted or perfected. The exact status of this Corporation between these dates might be under some circumstances a matter of grave importance, as to which it would be the duty of the court to instruct you more fully. But here the court has, in the instructions already given, indicated the greatest influence it can have on this issue between the parties. Perhaps a fuller explanation of the legal effect of the proof about the status of this Corporation may aid you. It cannot be denied that the defendants were partners from the date of their partnership articles to the dissolution of [595] the partnership by the substitution of a corporation; nor can it be denied that, as early as 1880, more than a year before this transaction began, the defendants took the primary step to organize a corporation, but nothing more until May or June, 1881, a short time before this contract was made; but it is equally undeniable that they negotiated and dealt with plaintiff as partners, necessarily so, until the Corporation was more thoroughly established than it was by this primary step. Now, there is no proof tending to show the plaintiff's agents had any sort of knowledge of the corporate existence of 'The McGowan Pump Company,' in fact, down to the very moment of signing the contract of June 28, 1881 when the defendants testify they told Beach of it, and that they were contracting as a corporation, which is denied by the plaintiff." "There is no proof whatever that plaintiff's agents" "were ever informed by defendants of their own corporate capacity, be it what it may, at any time prior to the signing of the contract, or that by other means they had such information. Therefore the court charges you that, by their relations in fact, the course of their dealings with the plaintiff, as shown by their letters and repeated interviews with each other throughout the negotiations, from the beginning to the moment of signing the contract, the defendants are estopped, in fact and law, to deny that, as to the plaintiff, they were partners in making the contract, unless you believe that they then disclosed their corporate character to Beach. If you find that to be a fact, the court has already told you that your verdict should be absolutely for the defendants. If you do not find that to be a fact, but, on the contrary, believe the plaintiff's proof that no such disclosure was made, the defendants are liable as partners for whatever damages you may find for the plaintiff, on the merits of the case."

The court also gave the following instruction, at the request of the defendants: "2. If, before the 23d day of June, 1881, the McGowan Pump Company had become incorporated and organized under the laws of Ohio, with Theodore McGowan as president and Robert C. Bliss as secretary, and if, when the contract of [596] that date was made, the plaintiff was informed by the defendants that the McGowan Pump Company, which entered into said contract, was a corporation, then the plaintiff cannot recover against the present defendants."

The court refused to give the following instructions asked by the defendants, and to each refusal the defendants excepted: "If the McGowan Pump Company, which entered into the contract of June 23, 1881, was in fact an incorporated company and not a partnership, then the plaintiff cannot recover in this case, whether the plaintiff supposed it to be a partnership or not." "31. If the agent of the plaintiff, sent here to make a contract for this work, did contract with the McGowan Pump Company, and had it explained to him that the said Company had organized as a corporation, and the defendants went on under said Corporation, and did the work provided for, which the plaintiff subsequently took from said Corporation, they cannot now deny that they dealt with the said Corporation."

It is objected by the defendants that the court did not specify any limit of time prior to the making of the contract of June 28, 1881, during which the holding out of the defendants to the plaintiff as partners, and the dealing of the plaintiff with them as such, would have the effect, in the absence of notice to the plaintiff of the change from a partnership to a corporation, to fix the liability of the defendants as partners; that, although the bill of exceptions states that the plaintiff and the defendants were in correspondence prior to the organization of the Corporation, it does not state that there had been any dealings between them; and that especially there was error in refusing to charge proposition 31, above quoted.

The bill of exceptions does not show that there was any evidence that the defendants went on doing the work as a corporation, or that the plaintiff took the work from the Corporation. There was no exception to the general charge of the court on the subject, above quoted. The court, in its general charge, distinctly instructed the jury that if McGowan, as president of the Corporation, and Bliss as its secretary, made the contract of June 28, 1881, in the name of "The McGowan Pump Company," and informed the agent of the plaintiff [597] at the time that the McGowan Pump Company was a corporation and was contracting in that capacity, the defendants were entitled to a verdict. Again, the court instructed the jury that if, notwithstanding any want of authority in McGowan and Bliss to contract for the Corporation, they assumed, in their corporate capacity, to contract with the plaintiff, and to notify the plaintiff's agent, Beach, that they so assumed to act, or he otherwise knew it, their verdict must be for the defendants, irrespective of any want of authority. Again, in its general charge, the court instructed the jury as follows: "If the jury find that, on the 23d of June, 1881, there was in existence a corporation called 'The Mc-Gowan Pump Co.,' qualified to do business when the contract of that date was signed in that name, and that the defendants were authorized to act for it, and informed Beach that it was that Corporation making the contract, the verdict must be for the defendants, because the Corporation is not here sued."

This disposition of the question of partnership by the court seems to us to have been proper and to have been as favorable to the defendants as they were entitled to ask.

The criticism as to the want of the specification of the limit of time has no force. The bill of exceptions does not purport to state all the evidence that was given at the trial. It does not show what dealings had been had between the parties prior to the making of the contract of June 23, 1881; nor does it appear by the record that the attention of the court was drawn by the defendants to this point of the limit of time, or that any request was made in regard to it.

It is next objected by the defendants that the petition of the plaintiff alleges that the contract sued upon was fully performed by the plaintiff, and alleges, as a breach, that the defendants failed to erect and complete the machinery within the time set forth in the contract; that the averment of performance by the plaintiff is inconsistent with a recovery based on the theory that the defendants waived the performance by the plaintiff of the part of the contract relating to the time when the boat was to be furnished; that the plaintiff could not re-[598] cover, on the averments of the petition, without proving that the boat was ready to receive the machinery in time to allow it to be erected on the boat before the end of sixty days from June 23, 1881; and that the proof was that the boat was not ready for the machinery until about the 10th of November, 1881.

On this subject the court charged the jury as follows, under the exception of the defendants: "If the jury find that the contract was made, as alleged, with defendants, and that, after the day named for the completion of the contract, the work not being then completed, the boat was not then in readiness to receive it, yet if the boat was thereafter made ready by James Mack, and the defendants proceeded under the contract, they were then bound to complete it within the same length of time contemplated by the original agreement, and such additional time as may have been lost in the prosecution of the work, occasioned by Mack's delay in the construction of the boat; and, failing in this, they are liable for the consequences of such failure and delay. Therefore, the court charges you that the defendants are only liable for any damage caused by delay for the period of delay found by application of the above rule to the proof in this case."

The defendants contend that this was not a proper charge under the issues, and that, if the boat was not ready for the machinery within the sixty days provided for by the contract, the agreement of the defendants, if they proceeded to construct the machinery, became an agreement to deliver it within a reasonable time after the boat should be made ready to receive it. In accordance with these views, the defendants asked for the following instructions, each of which was refused and to each refusal they excepted: "4. That the contract sued on is entire, and required the plaintiff to have the machinery therein described built and set up on board a boat to be furnished by the plaintiff, within 60 days from June 23, 1881, and that, if the plaintiff failed to furnish such boat until after the said period of 60 days from June 23, 1881, had expired, and, by reason of such failure, the defendants were unable to begin to set up such machinery on board said boat until after the expiration of said period of 60 days from June 23, 1881, then the defendants are entitled to recover." "21. That, if the boat was not ready for the machinery in time to have the same put up within 60 days from the date of the contract, but the parties subsequently proceeded, at the request of Beach, to put the machinery upon the boat, they were only bound to proceed with reasonable diligence under the circumstances, and were not bound to complete the same within 60 days thereafter, if the boat or the foundations provided for the machinery were so insufficient as to prevent such completion within said time." "23. That, as the machinery was to be put upon a boat to be furnished by the plaintiff, to require of the defendants that they have the machinery finished and put up on the boat within the 60 days, the plaintiff must have had the boat ready and fit for the purpose in time to enable the defendants to have put the machinery in place upon the boat, the same being ready therefor, within the 60 days, and, if the boat was not ready in such time, then the plaintiff cannot recover damages for not having the said machinery so completed within 60 days. In such case the defendants were only bound to proceed with due diligence under the circumstances."

The argument on the part of the defendants is that the plaintiff, by failing to have the boat ready in time for the performance of the contract according to its terms, prevented such performance; that there was no mere postponement of it for the number of days of delay caused by the plaintiff; that there is nothing to show that the defendants agreed, or would have agreed, to erect the machinery within 60 days after November 10, 1881; that, although both parties went on to perform the contract, the element of the fixed time was eliminated from it; and that the true rule is that the contract was to be performed in a reasonable time, having regard to the nature and circumstances of the performance.

The bill of exceptions states that the plaintiff "gave evidence tending to show that the machinery named in the said contract of June 23, 1881, was not completely finished and put upon said boat within the 60 days named in said contract, nor for a long time thereafter;" that, in consequence thereof, it "suffered great delay in the use of the said boat and machinery, [600] and great damage in having to expend a large sum of money upon the same; and that the plaintiff lost a very large sum of money by the breach of said contract before it," the machinery, "was finished."

The petition contains an allegation of special damage, from the loss of tan bark occasioned by the delay in not erecting the machinery within 60 days from June 23, 1881; but the bill of exceptions does not show that there was any evidence tending to establish this special damage, except as it may be inferred, from the general charge of the court, that such testimony was offered. But the court, in its general charge, instructed the jury as follows: "The contract bound the defendants to complete the machinery and set it up on the boat within 60 days. It is too plain for argument that the failure of the plaintiff to have the boat ready would excuse the defendants from strict compliance with this part of the contract, and that all delay which occurred before the boat was ready is out of the case. The plaintiff was as much responsible for that as the defendants, or sufficiently so to preclude him from complaint on that score."

It is therefore claimed by the plaintiff that no damages were included in the verdict on account of the delay in not erecting the machinery within 60 days from June 23, 1881. This appears to be a sound proposition. We see no error in the charge of the court, that, if the defendants proceeded under the contract, they were bound to complete the work within the length of time contemplated by the original agreement, and such additional time as was lost by the delay in the construction of the boat. There is nothing in the bill of exceptions to show that the machinery could not have been erected within 60 days after the boat was ready to receive it. The parties treated the contract as in full force, except as to the time in which it was to be performed, and the work was done and the payments were made under the contract as thus extended in time. The defendants made no claim before the suit was brought, that the contract was rescinded by reason of the nonreadiness of the boat until the 10th of November, 1881, or that there was any reason [601] in that fact which prevented them from complying with their part of the contract within the 60 days after the delivery of the boat. No such defense is set up by them in their answer, and they introduced no evidence to that effect, so far as the bill of exceptions shows. These views are in accordance with the ruling of this court in Phillips & Colby C. Co. v. Seymour, 91 U. S. 646 [23: 341]. The plaintiff went on paying the defendants on account for the machinery, and the defendants proceeded in erecting it without complaining of the delay in the furnishing of the boat, and without any claim that they were not required to furnish the machinery within the 60 days after the furnishing of the boat. See also Graveson v. Tobey, 75 Ill. 540.

The next assignment of error relates to the effect of the contract of March 30, 1882, set up in the third defense in the amended answer. The theory of the defendants is that this contract was substituted for all prior contracts and ought to have been the basis of the suit. The circuit court treated it as merely waiving the provision of the original contract in regard to the time required for pressing and delivering each bale.

The court, in its general charge, charged as follows, in regard to the contract of March 30, 1882, under exception by the defendants: "But the plaintiff has not sued on that contract, nor averred any breach of it in that respect. It has sued for breaches of the guaranty for a good machine, and nothing else. This contract is pleaded by defendants as a defense to a claim of breach, and, so setting it up, the only question is whether it constitutes a defense. It is only a supplemental contract to that of June 23. It continues the guaranties of that contract, with the exception as to time. It does not make new guaranties for a new consideration, but obligates the defendants to carry out the old contract with the named exception, and imposes on defendants new obligations about the patterns, etc., which are independent and separable from the old contract and the old consideration. The court, therefore, charges you that its only effect is to reduce the original guaranty of the capacity of the machine, in respect to the time [602] for pressing the bale, if you find there was no fraud in procuring it; if there was such fraud it leaves that guaranty still in force." And again: "The defendants claim that its proper construction requires that the 1,500 tons only applies to strength of material to endure that pressure, as a maximum of endurance, not for a continuous working pressure. It belonged to the plaintiff to say what it wanted, and to defendants to consider it when they made the contract, whether they could give that which was wanted. There is no proof tending to show that the proper construction is that the plaintiff only wanted a machine of sufficient strength to endure a test of 1,500 tons; but, on the contrary, read in the light of the circumstances proved, the language of the contract clearly means that the plaintiff wanted a machine by which it could deliver on each and every bale a compression of 1,500 tons, if it chose so to use it, and which would endure the work for the length of time such a machine would wear, under prudent and reasonable management by the plaintiff." Still further: "If the jury find that the terms of the guaranty provided by the contract are in writing, as expressed in the letters of April 23 and July 5, 1881, then, while the McGowan Pump Co. did not guarantee that bark would bale, it did guaranty to furnish practical machinery, set up on board of the boat, that was capable, in its design and in all its parts, of being worked to apply 1,500 tons pressure to press a bale of bark every two and one half minutes, or within a reasonable time, if the contract of March 30 be valid, and capable, with reasonable care, in view of the character of such machinery and of the nature of the work, of continuous operation for the ordinary duration of such mechanism constructed for similar uses." "If the jury find that the contract of March 30, 1882, was duly made and is binding between the parties, it in no wise affects the right of the plaintiff to recover for any breach of the original agreement between the parties upon which this action is founded, or of the guaranties contained in such original agreement, except for the failure in respect to the time required to press bark with the machinery into bales, and to remove them from the cylinders. All the other obliga- [603] tions and guaranties of the original contract would remain in full force, and the plaintiff's right to recover for their breach would remain unaffected by the contract of March 30, 1882."

The defendants requested the following instructions, each of which was refused by the court, and to each refusal the defendants excepted: "5. That the plaintiff cannot recover upon the issue in this cause if it appear to the jury, from the testimony, that the contract which has been read in evidence, bearing date March 30, 1882, was in good faith executed and delivered by both the parties to this cause." "10. That the plaintiff does not entitle itself to recover upon the contract of June 23, 1881, by showing that the defendants failed to comply with the contract of March 30, 1882." "That, even if it be true, and believed by the jury from the testimony, that the contract of March 30, 1882, was broken by the defendants by nondelivery of the receipts, or of assignments of patent-rights, therein described, nevertheless, such breach does not entitle the plaintiff to recover in this case upon the contract of June 23, 1881." "12. A breach of the contract of March 30, 1882, entitles the party who did not break such contract, if it suffered damages by reason of such breach, to recover in an action for such damages founded upon such contract; but it furnishes no ground for recovery in this case upon the contract of June 23, 1881, for damages suffered by reason of a breach of the last named contract." "14. That, by the contract of March 30, 1882, the parties waived and withdrew all previous agreements and guaranties relating to the hydraulic machinery, except only that the material of which it was composed had sufficient strength to work up to a total pressure of a thousand tons, and that the defendants are not liable to damages, in this action, for any defect in said hydraulic machinery, if said material had sufficient strength to work up to such pressure, unless, under the charge of the court, the jury believe, from the testimony, that the said contract was procured by fraud or false representation, and is, therefore, not binding upon the plaintiff." "28. If it appear, in this case, that the machinery contracted for in the contract of March 30, 1882, was not possible to be made as working machinery, because the material of which it was [604] to be made was not capable of sustaining any such working pressure, yet that the material used by the defendants was of the strength of 1,500 tons, then the contract of the 30th March, 1882, must be construed as relating to the strength of the material and not to the working capacity of the machinery."

The argument on the part of the defendants is that the instrument of March 30, 1882, contained a new contract, and that the effect of it was to withdraw all guaranties relative to the hydraulic machinery, except that the strength of the material would be such as to bear 1,500 tons pressure; that the new contract did not modify the original guaranty that the boilers and machinery for propelling the steamboat would be made in a workmanlike manner and of first class material, with sufficient capacity to do the required work and to pass government inspection, but that all guaranties in regard to the hydraulic machinery intended to press the bark into bales were withdrawn except the one relating to the strength of material; and that, as to that, all guaranties were withdrawn except that the material would bear 1,500 tons pressure, not for continuous work, but a pressure up to 1,500 tons, or without bursting upon test.

The view taken by the court on this subject is shown by the following instructions given by it, to each of which the defendants excepted: "5. The written contract, if the jury find it was made between the plaintiff and the defendants, requires the machinery to be made under it to be constructed in a workmanlike manner and of first class materials and to be set up aboard of the plaintiff's boat in Cincinnati. The machinery is to have sufficient capacity to do the required work, and is guarantied by the McGowan Pump Company. The contract having thus defined the character of the work, it cannot in that respect be varied by parol evidence, which is admissible only to enable us to properly interpret the contract. It required the machinery to be constructed in a workmanlike manner and of first class materials." "6. The machinery being constructed to be set up on the plaintiff's boat, it is for the jury to determine what the boat was that was referred to, [605] and, if the boat intended was one provided to be constructed by one James Mack, of a kind, and of dimensions, and with bulk heads and foundations, then defined and understood by the parties, then this contract to construct the machinery required the McGowan Pump Company to furnish whatever was necessary for the efficient working of the machinery upon the boat and bulk heads so defined and understood by the parties, for rendering the machinery stable to do the required work, when set up aboard the boat."

The court also refused to give the following instructions asked by the defendants, and they excepted to each refusal: "18. If the machinery contracted for in this case was in fact incapable of working up to the pressure of 1,500 tons, required by contracts between the parties, and this incapacity resulted not from any defect of workmanship or construction, but from the fact that such machinery, of the character and description provided for by said contracts, cannot be made capable of working up to such pressure, and if the machinery was in fact made of first class material and in a workmanlike manner, and was capable of receiving the greatest pressure machinery of the description called for by said contract could be made to work up to—then the fact that said machinery will not work up to such pressure does not entitle the plaintiff to recover any damages based on such incapacity to work up to such pressure." "That the guaranty referred to in the contract of June 23, 1881, is a guaranty of the machinery to be made, and not a guaranty as to its operation upon the boat which the plaintiff might present for that purpose to the defendants."

The defendants also excepted to the following parts of the general charge of the court: "But, if you find that, within the range of mechanical art, such pressure could have been delivered to the bark, it was their obligation to do it. The whole field of mechanical engineering was open to them, except so far as it was restricted by the necessity of placing the machine upon a floating foundation, to be furnished by the plaintiff, of which more here- [606] after will be given you in charge. They were not restricted in plans, specifications or materials, and were bound to select such plans and materials as were available and capable of doing the work. It was their misfortune if the price demanded was not sufficient to cover the cost; but that fact, if it be one, cannot relieve them. In short, they contracted as 'mechanical engineers,' and as manufacturers, and are bound by the contract as they made it, in this respect."

In regard to the foregoing matters the defendants allege, as error, that the circuit court held that the contract was broken unless the hydraulic machinery had sufficient capacity to do the required work, was constructed in a workmanlike manner and of first class materials, and would work efficiently and be capable of continuous operation for the ordinary duration of such mechanism, constructed for similar uses, and be able to deliver a pressure of 1,500 tons to the bark, and that the plaintiff could by it compress every bale to the extent of 1,500 tons pressure, for the length of time such a machine would work under prudent and reasonable management.

The contract of March 30, 1882, did not, as erroneously stated in the 28th request of the defendants, contract for any machinery. It refers to the machinery as being in existence, and provides for the transfer to the plaintiff of the title to it and to certain extras, and adjusts the amount due under the original contract at the sum of $11,200. It contains a modification of the original contract in respect to the time required for each pressing and delivery of a bale, and provides, in substance, that the original agreement, with its guaranties as to the hydraulic machinery, shall otherwise remain unaltered. The court, in its general charge to the jury, charged on these matters as follows: "But it is insisted this contract of March 30, 1882, is not binding and can have no effect in this suit, because defendants have not performed their part of the consideration; namely, the delivery of the vouchers or receipts mentioned, the transfer of the patterns, the interest in the patents for the accumulator, and the double end; that, as to the latter, there is no patent and can be no performance. The defendants insist, on the other hand, that the balance of the money has not been paid by plaintiff, and it cannot complain of nonperformance; and there is proof tending to show defendants have still pending an application for this patent. The court regards all this subject as immaterial to this controversy, and charges you that the obligation to perform these things by the defendants does not arise until the money is tendered or paid, and no breach could be averred until that has been done. But the plaintiff has not sued on that contract or averred any breach of it in that respect. It has sued for breaches of the guaranty for a good machine, and nothing else. This contract is pleaded by defendants as a defense to a claim of breach, and, so setting it up, the only question is whether it constitutes a defense." "The court, therefore, charges you, that its only effect is to reduce the original guaranty for the capacity of the machine in respect to the time for pressing the bale, if you find there was no fraud in procuring it; if there was such fraud, it leaves that guaranty still in force. But you must understand that the failure, if any, of the defendants to deliver the vouchers, patterns, etc., does not at all contribute to any alleged breach of the guaranty for the capacity and quality of the machine, and such failure does not entitle plaintiff to recover for anything sued for in this suit."

We are of opinion that the court rightly disposed of the questions involved in the foregoing branch of the case.

It is also alleged by the defendants, as error, that the court instructed the jury that if they found for the plaintiff, they were not to make any deduction from the amount of damages on account of any balance claimed to be due from the plaintiff to the defendants on account of the contract for the machinery, or on account of any other contract. The defendants claimed to recoup the sum of $7,200 as remaining due to them under the contract of June 23, 1881, or that of March 30, 1882, and the further sum of $1,531.46 for extra work alleged to have been performed by them; but they did not, in any of their pleadings, set up any counterclaim or right of recoupment as to those items; and it is alleged, in the fourth defense in their amended answer, that an action is pending against the plaintiff by the McGowan Pump Company to recover the $1,531.46.

It is also alleged, by the defendants, as error, that the court did not instruct the jury, as requested by the defendants, that, although the machinery was in fact incapable of working up to the pressure of 1,500 tons, and the incapacity resulted from the fact that machinery of the character and description provided for by the contract could not be made capable of working up to such pressure, the fact that it would not work up to such pressure did not entitle the plaintiff to recover any damages based on such incapacity. The bill of exceptions states that the plaintiff gave evidence tending to show that the machinery was only of the value of scrap, and it does not state that there was any testimony given to show that, without the capacity called for by the contract, it was of any value beyond its value as scrap iron, or that there was any testimony tending to show that the loss of actual value upon the machinery was less than the amount found by the jury, or that the machinery had any value except that of old iron, if the pressure with which it would work would have no effect in doing the needed work upon the tan bark.

The rule of damages laid down by the court was as follows, and was not excepted to: "The rule for measuring the plaintiff's damages is to find the difference between the money value of the machinery contracted for, if it had been constructed in all respects according to the contract as it has been construed for you by the court, and the money value of the machinery as it was actually construed and delivered to the plaintiff, to which may be added the items of expense for keep of the boat during the delay, caused solely by the delay."

As to the refusal of the court to give the 24th instruction requested by the defendants, we are of opinion that the general charge of the court properly covered the matter involved, and that the court made no error in refusing to charge as requested in regard to the contract of April 19, 1882.

There are other matters arising on the charge and the refusals of the court to charge, which are either covered by the observations already made, or upon which, although the questions raised in regard to them have been considered by the court, it is not deemed necessary specially to remark.

The objection to the competency of the testimony of the witness Kemplin, as an expert, was properly overruled. He was a hydraulic engineer, and had been engaged in the construction of steam engines and other machinery for many years, although he had never built any steam engines to be used on the western rivers. He was on board of the boat during its trip from Cincinnati to Paducah, and saw the propelling machinery in operation and examined it, and gave testimony as to the value of propelling engines for such a boat and as to what it would cost to make them good. The question as to the weight of his evidence was one for the jury, in view of his testimony as to his experience.

On the whole case, we are of opinion that there is no error in the record, and the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

TIERY WRIGHT, Plff. in Err.,
v.
B. H. ROSEBERRY ET AL

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 488-521.)

Public lands—Swamp-Land Act of 1850—grant in præsenti—subsequent identification—failure of Secretary of Interior to identify—other proof—Act of 1866—state certificates of purchase—Statute of California—prima facie evidence of title—ejectment—when patent may be collaterally attacked—omission to mark segregation map as filed—double operation of patent.

1. The Swamp-Land Act of September 28, 1850, operated as a grant in præsenti to the State then in existence of all the swamp lands in their respective jurisdictions, passing the title to said lands as of its date, but requiring identification to render the title perfect.

2. The action of the Secretary of the Interior in identifying such lands is conclusive against collateral attack; but, when he has neglected or failed to make the identification, it is competent for the grantees of the State, to prevent their rights from being defeated, to identify the lands in any other appropriate mode.

3. The first section of the Act of July 23, 1866, does not apply to swamp and overflowed lands. It was not in satisfaction of a grant of those lands that the State could select lands from any part of the public domain. All it could do was to ascertain where those lands were.

4. Under the Statute of California, certificates of purchase of swamp and overflowed lands are prima facie evidence of legal title to the premises in the holders, and upon them ejectment can be maintained in the state courts.

5. A patent may be collaterally impeached in any action, and its operation as a conveyance defeated, by showing that the department had no jurisdiction to dispose of the lands; that is, that the law did not provide for selling them, or that they had been reserved from sale or dedicated to special purposes, or had been previously transferred to others.

6. The omission by a Surveyor-General to mark a segregation map as filed does not affect its validity as evidence.

7. In the legislation of Congress a patent has a double operation. It is a conveyance by the government when the government has any interest to convey, but where it is issued upon the confirmation of a claim of a previously existing title, it is documentary evidence, having the dignity of a record, of the existence of that title, or of such equities respecting the claim as justify its recognition and confirmation.

Submitted March 21, 1887. Decided May 2, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of California.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John Mullan, and C. P. Sprague for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. C. Belcher, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover possession of a tract of land situated in the County of Yolo, in the State of California, consisting, according to the public surveys, of portions of sections 24, 25 and 36 of township 11 north, range 2 east, in that county, and embracing 560 acres. The land is particularly described as follows: The north half of the southeast quarter, and the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section twenty-four (24), the east half of the northeast quarter and the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter of section twenty-five (25), the southeast quarter of section twenty-five (25), and the northeast quarter of section thirty-six (36), all in township eleven (11) north, range two (2) east, Mount Diablo base and meridian. It is alleged to be swamp and overflowed land, which was granted to the State by the Act of Congress of September 28, 1850, "to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits." 9 Stat. at L. 519. The complaint is in the usual form in such actions, alleging the plaintiff's seisin in fee of the land and his right of possession, the unlawful entry thereon of the defendants and their ousting him therefrom, and their continued withholding of the possession, to his damage of $1,000. It also alleges that the rents and profits of the land are of the value of $560 a year. The prayer is for judgment of restitution of the premises and for the damages, rents and profits claimed. [489]

Two of the defendants united in their answer, one of them being a tenant of the other; the other defendants answered separately. All denied the allegations of the complaint, and, except in the case of the tenant, asserted ownership in fee of portions of the demanded premises, which they described in their respective answers; and all set up the Statute of Limitations in bar of the action.

The action was twice tried by the State District Court in which it was commenced, and, by stipulation of parties, without a jury. At both trials the plaintiff asserted title to the premises as swamp and overflowed lands by conveyance from parties who had purchased them from the State. The defendants claimed the premises through patents of the United States, issued under the preemption laws to them or to parties from whom they derived their interest. On the first trial, the court found that 160 acres were swamp and overflowed land on the 28th of September, 1850, within the meaning of the Act of Congress of that date, and gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff for their possession; but, as to the other portions of the premises, the court failed to find whether or not the plaintiff was the [490] owner thereof or entitled to their possession. For this failure the Supreme Court of the State, on appeal, reversed the judgment, and remanded the cause to the district court, with directions to find upon those issues from the evidence already taken, and such further evidence as might be adduced, and to render judgment upon the whole case. Upon the second trial thus ordered, further testimony was accordingly taken. The court thereupon set aside its previous findings, found on all the issues in favor of the defendants, and gave judgment in their favor. On appeal to the supreme court this judgment was affirmed. It does not distinctly appear what caused the district court to change its first decision with respect to those lands, which it had originally held to be swamp and overflowed; but, as it admitted in evidence the patents of the United States, and held that they passed the title to the defendants, it probably had reached the conclusion which the supreme court subsequently announced, that the plaintiff could not maintain an action upon the title to swamp and overflowed lands until they had been certified as such to the State, pursuant to the fourth section of the Act of Congress of July 23, 1866, "To Quiet Land Titles in California." For want of such certificate, the court decided that the title to the demanded premises never vested in the State, and that she could not convey a title to the plaintiff upon which he could maintain an action of ejectment against persons in possession under patents of the United States. This ruling constitutes the alleged error for which a reversal is sought. To determine its correctness, it will be necessary to consider the nature of the grant to the State of the swamp and overflowed lands, the proceedings taken [495] under the laws of the State and of the United States to ascertain and define their boundaries, and the effect of the Act of July 23, 1866, and of section 2488 of the Revised Statutes as confirmatory of previous segregations by the State. The following is the Swamp-Land Act of September 28, 1850:

"AN ACT to Enable the State of Arkansas and Other States to Reclaim the 'Swamp Lands' Within Their Limits.

"Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, to enable the State of Arkansas to construct the necessary levees and drains to reclaim the swamp and overflowed lands therein, the whole of those swamp and overflowed lands made unfit thereby for cultivation, which shall remain unsold at the passage of this Act, shall be and the same are hereby granted to said State.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, as soon as may be practicable after the passage of this Act, to make out an accurate list and plats of the lands described, as aforesaid, and transmit the same to the Governor of the State of Arkansas, and at the request of said Governor cause a patent to be issued to the State therefor; and on that patent the fee simple to the lands shall vest in the said State of Arkansas, subject to the disposal of the Legislature thereof; Provided, however, That the proceeds of said lands, whether from sale or by direct appropriation in kind, shall be applied exclusively, as far as necessary, to the purpose of reclaiming said lands by means of the levees and drains aforesaid.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in making out a list and plats of the land aforesaid, all legal subdivisions, the greater part of which is 'wet and unfit for cultivation,' shall be included in said list and plats; but when the greater part of a subdivision is not of that character, the whole of it shall be excluded therefrom.

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this Act be extended to, and their benefits be conferred upon, each of the other States of the Union in which such swamp and overflowed lands, known and designated as [496] aforesaid, may be situated." 9 Stat. at L. 519.

Soon after the passage of this Act, the question arose as to the time the grant took effect; whether at the date of the Act, or on the issue of the patent to the State upon the request of the Governor, after the list and plats of the lands were made out by the Secretary of the Interior and transmitted to him. The question was one of great importance to all the States in which there were swamp and overflowed lands. These lands amounted to many millions of acres. In California alone there were, according to the reports of the land department, nearly two millions of acres.

The object of the grant, as stated in the Act, was to enable the several States to which it was made, to construct the necessary levees and drains to reclaim the lands; and the Act required the proceeds from them, whether from their sale or other disposition, to be used, so far as necessary, exclusively for that purpose. The early reclamation of the lands was of great importance to the States, not only on account of their extraordinary fertility when once reclaimed, but for the reason that until then they were the cause of malarial fevers and diseases in the neighborhood.

The language of the first section of the Act indicates a grant in præsenti to each State of lands within its limits of the character described. Its words "shall be and are hereby granted" import an immediate transfer of interest, not a promise of a transfer in the future. It was only when the other sections of the Act were read that a doubt was raised as to the immediate operation of the Act. On the one hand, it was contended that these sections postponed the vesting of title in the State until the lands granted were identified, and a patent of the United States for them was issued. On the other hand, it was insisted that effect must be given to the clear words of the granting clause of the first section, which, ex vi termini, import the passing of a present interest, and that, in consistency with them, the other provisions of the Act should be regarded as simply providing the mode of identifying the lands, and furnishing documentary evidence of their identification, and not as a limitation upon vesting the [497] right to them in the State, as this would make the investiture dependent upon the request of the Governor, and not upon the Act of Congress. It was also urged that identification of the lands could be made in a majority of instances from simple examination of them, and that no policy of the government could be advanced by postponing the passing of the title until the identification by the Secretary of the Interior; and that the clause providing, that upon the issue of the patent the fee should pass, was merely declaratory of the nature of the title, the patent operating merely by way of further assurance.

The question thus brought to the attention of the department, under whose supervision the Act was to be carried into effect, was one upon which men might very well differ; but after its solution had been reached, and the conclusion was acted upon, necessarily affecting titles to immense tracts of land, there should be the clearest evidence of error, as well as the strongest reasons of policy and justice controlling, before a departure from it should be sanctioned.

There are numerous cases in the history of the country, where Congress, after confirming to parties title to lands, has directed that patents of the United States should be issued to them; yet, it has been held that the patent in such cases operated merely as record evidence of the title, and added nothing to the title itself. An illustration of this is presented in the case of claims confirmed to lands in the Northwest Territory which originated previously to its cession to the United States. By the Act of Congress of March 26, 1804, 2 Stat. at L. 277, chap. 35, every person claiming lands within certain designated limits of that territory by virtue of a legal grant made by the French Government prior to the Treaty of Paris of the 10th of February, 1763; or by the British Government subsequent to that period, and prior to the Treaty of Peace between the United States and Great Britain on the third of September, 1783; or by virtue of any Resolution or Act of Congress subsequent to that Treaty, was required to deliver, on or before the first of January, 1805, to the register of the land-office of the district in which the land was situated, [498] a notice stating the nature and extent of his claim, together with a plat of the tract or tracts claimed. The register of the land-office and the receiver of public moneys were constituted commissioners within their respective districts for the purpose of examining the claims. It was made their duty to hear in a summary manner all matters respecting them, to examine witnesses, and to take any testimony that might be adduced before them and decide thereon according to justice and equity, and to transmit a transcript of their decisions in favor of claimants to the Secretary of the Treasury, who was required to lay it before Congress at the ensuing session.

Among the claims presented under this Act was one by the heirs of Jean Baptiste Tongas for lands in the neighborhood of Vincennes, the claim being founded upon an ancient grant to their ancestor. The commissioners decided in favor of the heirs and confirmed their claim, and transmitted a transcript of their decision to the Secretary of the Treasury, who laid the same before Congress. By the Act of March 3, 1807, 2 Stat. at L. 446, chap. 47, this and other decisions in favor of persons claiming lands in the same District of Vincennes, transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, were confirmed. The Act declared that every person or his legal representative, whose claim was confirmed and who had not previously obtained a patent therefor from the Governor of the Territory northwest of the Ohio, or of Indiana Territory, should, whenever his claim was located and surveyed, have a right to receive from the Register of the Land-Office at Vincennes a certificate, which should entitle him to a patent for his land, to be issued to him in like manner as is provided by law "for the other lands of the United States." A survey of the tract thus confirmed was made in 1820, but no patent was issued until 1872, when one was issued, reciting the confirmation by the Act of 1807 of the decision of the commissioners under the Act of 1804. The patent purported "to give and grant" to the heirs of Tongas the tract in question in fee. A party claiming under the heirs brought ejectment for the premises. The defendant claimed as tenant under one who had been in actual possession under claim and color of title for thirty years. The question for decision was, when did the title to the land [499] vest in the heirs of Tongas. The court below held that it vested by the Act of confirmation of 1807, when the land was located and surveyed in 1820, and that the patent was not itself the grant of the land by the United States, but merely evidence that a grant had been made to the heirs of Tongas. The defendant, therefore, had judgment. The case being brought to this court, the judgment was affirmed. Langdeau v. Hanes, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 521 [22:606]. In deciding the case, the court said:

"In the legislation of Congress a patent has a double operation. It is a conveyance by the government when the government has any interest to convey; but where it is issued upon the confirmation of a claim of a previously existing title, it is documentary evidence, having the dignity of a record, of the existence of that title, or of such equities respecting the claim as justify its recognition and confirmation. The instrument is not the less efficacious as evidence of previously existing rights because it also embodies words of release or transfer from the government. In the present case the patent would have been of great value to the claimants as record evidence of the ancient possession and title of their ancestor, and of the recognition and confirmation by the United States, and would have obviated, in any controversies at law respecting the land, the necessity of other proof, and would thus have been to them an instrument of quiet and security. But it would have added nothing to the force of the confirmation. The survey required for the patent was only to secure certainty of description in the instrument, and to inform the government of the quantity reserved to private parties from the domain ceded by Virginia."

The grants by the United States of land to aid in the construction of railroads, in relation to which we have had many cases before us, are in many particulars analogous to the grant by the Swamp-Land Act. They are usually of a specified number of sections of land on each side of the proposed route of the road, with a reservation of certain sales or other disposition made before such road becomes definitely fixed. [500]
The usual words of grant in such cases are similar to those in the Swamp-Land Act—"there is hereby granted." Though it is impossible to locate the land granted until the route is fixed, yet when that is fixed, the grant takes effect as of the date of the Act. This would be equally the case were the mode prescribed to fix the boundaries more complicated and difficult. Thus in the case of Leavenworth, L. & G. R. R. Co. v. United States, 92 U. S. 733 [23: 634], the language was, "There be and is hereby granted to the State of Kansas," and in reference to it the court said: "It creates an immediate interest and does not indicate a purpose to give in future. 'There be and is hereby granted' are words of absolute donation and import a grant in præsenti. This court has held that they can have no other meaning; and the land department, on this interpretation of them, has uniformly administered every previous similar grant. They vest a present title in the State of Kansas, though a survey of the lands and a location of the lands are necessary to give precision to it, and attach it to any particular tract. The grant then becomes certain, and by relation has the same effect upon the selected parcels as if it had specifically described them." See also R. R. Co. v. Baldwin, 103 U. S. 426 [26: 578]; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Kansas Pac. R. Co. 97 U. S. 491 [24: 1095]; Schulenberg v. Harriman, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 44, 60 [22: 551, 554]; Rutherford v. Greene's Heirs, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 196 [4: 218].

It is plain that the difficulty of identifying the swamp and overflowed lands could not defeat or impair the effect of the granting clause, by whomsoever such identification was required to be made. When identified, the title would become perfect as of the date of the Act. The patent would be evidence of such identification and declaratory of the title conveyed. It would establish definitely the extent and boundaries of the swamp and overflowed lands in any township, and thus render it unnecessary to resort to oral evidence on that subject. It would settle what otherwise might always be a mooted point, whether the greater part of any legal subdivision was so wet and unfit for cultivation as to carry the whole subdivision into the list. The determination of the secretary upon these matters, as shown by the patent, would be conclusive as against any collateral attacks, he being the officer to whose supervision and control the matter is especially confided. The patent would thus be an invaluable muniment of title and a source of quiet and peace to its possessor. But the right of the State under the first section would not be enlarged by the action of the secretary, except as to land, not swamp or overflowed, contained in a legal subdivision, as mentioned in the fourth section; nor could it be defeated, in regard to the swamp and overflowed lands, by his refusal to have the required list made out, or the patent issued, notwithstanding the delays and embarrassments which might ensue.

The conclusion which the land department reached upon its examination of the character of the grant, soon after the passage of the Act, was that the title passed to the State at the date of the Act. In a communication to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, under date of December 28, 1851, Mr. Stuart, then Secretary of the Interior, referring to the Act of 1850 and the Act of 1849 to aid Louisiana to drain her swamp lands, and stating that the first question involved was as to the period when the grants took effect—whether at the date of the law, or at the date of the approval of the selections by the secretary—said: "In each case the granting clause is in the first section, and the words employed, viz., 'are hereby granted,' seem to me to import a grant in præsenti. They confer the right to the land, though other proceedings are necessary to perfect the title. When the selections are made and approved, or the patent issued, the title therefor becomes perfect, and has relation back to the date of the grant." And further, "As the grants are regarded as taking effect from the date of the laws making them respectively, and as vesting the inchoate title in the States, it follows that any subsequent sale or location of swamp or overflowed lands must be held to be illegal, and the purchase money refunded, or a change of location ordered." Lester, Land Laws, 549, No. 578.

This construction of the grant has been followed by the secretary's successors to this day. In a communication to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, April 19, 1877, Secretary Schurz said: "The legal character of this grant (of 1850) has often been passed upon by the courts, and it has been uniformly held that the Act was a present grant, vesting in the State, proprio vigore, from the day of its date, title to all the land of the particular description therein designated, wanting nothing but the definition of the boundaries to make it perfect." And therefore, he held that swamp lands were not, in March, 1853, when the preemption laws were extended to California, public lands, and for that reason could not be entered and sold under those laws. "The Act of September 28, 1850," he added, "was notice to the world that all of the swampy lands in California were thereby granted in præsenti to the State, and were not subject to preemption, entry or sale thereafter; and the person who files a declaratory statement on lands actually swampy does so with full notice that they are not public lands and that he cannot obtain any right thereby." Copp, Public Land Laws, Vol. 2, p. 1048.

In a communication to the commissioner, of February 25, 1886, Secretary Lamar said: "The principle has been formerly established by the decisions of the courts and of this department that the grant of swamp lands made to the several States was a grant in præsenti, and conferred a present vested right to such lands as of the date of the grant, and that the field notes of survey may be taken as a basis in determining the character of the land if the State so selects." Decisions of Dept. Interior, Vol. 4, 415.

A similar construction of the grant was given by Attorney-General Black in an official communication to the Secretary of the Interior, under date of November 10, 1858. In February, 1853, Congress had made a grant of land to the States of Arkansas and Missouri to aid in the construction of a railroad, and under this grant a part of the lands previously granted to the State of Arkansas by the Act of September 28, 1850, under the designation of swamp lands, was included; and the question asked of the Attorney-General was which of the two Acts gave the better title. In reply, he said: "Where there is a conflict between two titles derived from the same source, either of which would be good if the other were out of the way, the elder one must always prevail; Prior in [503] tempore potior est in jure. This difficulty, therefore, is solved if the mere grant [of 1850], as you call it, gave the State a right to the land from the day of its date. That it did so there can be no doubt. In an opinion which I sent you on the 7th of June, 1857, concerning one of the same laws now under consideration, I said that a grant by Congress does of itself, proprio vigore, pass to the grantee all the estate which the United States had in the subject matter of the grant, except what is expressly excepted. I refer you to that opinion for the reasons and authorities upon which the principle is grounded. It is not necessary that the patent should issue before the title vests in the State under the Act of 1850. The Act of Congress was itself a present grant, wanting nothing but a definition of boundaries to make it perfect; and to attain that object the Secretary of the Interior was directed to make out an accurate list and plat of the lands and cause a patent to be issued therefor. But when a party is authorized to demand a patent for land his title is vested as much as if he had the patent itself, which is but evidence of his title." 9 Ops. Attys-Gen. 254.

The same view of the Act as a present grant, vesting in the State from its date the title to all the land within its limits of the particular description designated, wanting only a definition of boundaries to render the title perfect, was taken at an early period by the highest courts of several States within which swamp and overflowed lands existed. It was so held by the Supreme Court of Arkansas in 1859, in Fletcher v. Pool, 20 Ark. 100; in 1866, in Branch v. Mitchell, 24 Ark. 431, 444, and in 1874 in Ringo's Exr. v. Rotans' Heirs, 29 Ark. 56.

In Fletcher v. Pool, the court said: "That the Act was a present grant vesting in the State, proprio vigore, from the day of its date, title to all the land of the particular description therein designated, wanting nothing but the definition of boundaries to make it perfect, no doubts can be entertained. The object of the second section was not to postpone the vestiture of title in the State until a patent should issue, but was to provide for the ascertainment of [504] boundaries and to prevent a premature interference with the lands by the State Legislature before they were so designated as to avoid mistake and confusion."

In Branch v. Mitchell, the court said: "We continue satisfied with the decisions heretofore made; and again hold that all the lands in the State, which were really and in fact swamp and overflowed, and thereby unfit for cultivation, passed to and vested in the State, on the 28th of September, 1850. The case is the same as if the grant had been of all the prairie land, or all the wood land, or all the alluvial land, in the State; the difficulty of ascertainment of its character not affecting the question. The words of grant, the operative words, are direct and positive: "Shall be and the same are hereby granted to the State;" and the provision of the second section, that the Secretary of the Interior should make out and transmit to the Governor a list and plats of the land described, and at the request of the Governor cause a patent to issue to the State; and that "on that patent the fee simple to said lands shall vest in the said State," can no more be held to limit the effect of the present grant in the first section, than if, in a deed, after immediate and express conveyance of lands by some general description, it should be provided that, when the numbers should be ascertained, another deed should be made, "on which the fee simple should vest." This would make the title of the State to any of the land depend on the request of the Governor for a patent. The words of the second section must be held to be simply a definition of the nature of the title which the State took under the grant, and not a postponement of the period at which the title should vest." 24 Ark. 444-5.

And in Ringo's Exr. v. Rotan's Heirs, the court held that the title of the State to swamp and overflowed lands granted to her by the Act of September 28, 1850, accrued from the date of the Act, and that a title derived from the State took precedence over a grant by the United States subsequent to that time.

The same view was held by the Supreme Court of California in 1858, in Owens v. Jackson, 9 Cal. 322; and in Somers v. Dickinson, Id. 554; and in 1864 in Kernan v. Griffith, 27 Cal. 87; and in 1882 was assumed to be the correct [505] view in Sacramento Valley Reclamation Co. v. Cook, 61 Cal. 342. In the first of these cases, which was an action for the possession of swamp and overflowed lands held under a patent of the State, the defendant demurred to the complaint, on the ground that it did not show that the land had been surveyed and patented to the State. The demurrer was sustained in the court below, but the supreme court reversed the decision, holding that the State had the right to dispose of lands of that character granted to her by the Act of 1850, prior to the patent of the United States. "The Act of Congress," said the court, "describes the land, not by specific boundaries, but by its quality, and is a legislative grant of all the public lands within the State, of the quality mentioned. The patent is matter of evidence and description by metes and bounds. The office of the patent is to make the description of the land definite and conclusive as between the United States and the State." The same conclusion was reached in 1861 by the Supreme Court of Iowa in Allison v. Halfacre, 11 Iowa, 450, which was subsequently followed in all its decisions on the subject.

At a later day the Supreme Courts of Missouri and Oregon held the same doctrine. Clarkson v. Buchanan, 53 Mo. 563; Campbell v. Wortman, 58 Mo. 258; Gaston v. Stott, 5 Oreg. 48. The Supreme Court of Illinois, in 1863, expressed the same view in Supervisors v. State's Attorney, 31 Ill. 68; then receded from it in Grantham v. Atkins, 63 Ill. 359, and, in 1873, in Thompson v. Prince, 67 Ill. 281; but returned to its first conclusion, in 1875, in Keller v. Brickey, 78 Ill. 133.

The question came before this court at the December Term, 1869, in R. R. Co. v. Smith, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 95 [19:599], and the same doctrine as to the character of the grant was affirmed. On the 10th of June, 1852, Congress had made to the State of Missouri a grant of land to aid in the construction of certain railroads, and the Legislature of the State had conveyed the land to the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company. One Smith held certain swamp and overflowed lands, which he had [506] obtained from the State, and the question presented was whether the grant to the State in aid of the railroads covered the swamp and overflowed lands granted to her by the Act of September, 28, 1850, the latter not having been certified to the State by the Secretary of the Interior, nor patented to her. After referring to the first section the court said: "Here is a present grant by Congress of certain lands to the States within which they lie, but by a description which requires something more than a mere reference to their townships, ranges and sections to identify them, as coming within it. In this respect it is precisely like the railroad grants, which only become certain by the location of the road." And after stating that it was the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the character of the lands as swamp and overflowed, and to furnish the State with evidence of it, the court continued: "Must the State lose the land, though clearly swamp land, because that officer has neglected to do this? The right of the State did not depend on his action, but on the Act of Congress; and though the States might be embarrassed in the assertion of this right by the delay or failure of the secretary to ascertain and make out lists of these lands, the right of the States to them could not be defeated by that delay." The court added, that, as the Secretary of the Interior had no satisfactory evidence under his control to enable him to make out these lists, he must, if he attempted it, rely on witnesses whose personal knowledge would enable them to report as to the character of the tracts claimed to be swamp and overflowed; "that the matter to be shown was one of observation and examination, and, whether arising before the secretary, whose duty it was primarily to decide it, or before the court, whose duty it became because the secretary had failed to do it, this was clearly the best evidence to be had, and was sufficient for the purpose." And it was held that the grant in aid of the railroads did not include the swamp and overflowed lands.

In French v. Fyan, 93 U. S. 169 [23: 812], which was before this court at October Term, 1876, the same view was taken of the grant, and the effect to be given to a patent of the [507] United States for swamp lands was stated. That was an action of ejectment for such lands for which a patent had been issued to the State of Missouri under the Act of 1850. The lands had been conveyed to the Missouri Pacific Railroad Company by the State as part of the land granted to aid in the construction of its road by the Act of June 10, 1862, and the plaintiff had by purchase become vested with the title of the company. To overcome the prima facie case made by him the defendant gave in evidence the patent of the State under the Swamp-Land Act of 1850, from which he traced title by regular conveyances. The plaintiff then offered to prove by witnesses who had known the character of the land from 1849 down to the time of the trial, that the land was not swamp and overflowed, and made unfit thereby for cultivation, and that, since 1849, the greater part was not, and never had been, in that condition. The court below held that the question was concluded by the patent of the United States to the State for the land as swamp land under the Act of September 28, 1850, and rejected the testimony. The admissibility of the testimony was thus presented for determination. In giving our decision we said: "This court has decided more than once that the Swamp-Land Act was a grant in præsenti, by which the title to those lands passed at once to the State in which they lay, except as to the States admitted into the Union after its passage. The patent, therefore, which is the evidence that the lands contained in it had been identified as swamp lands under that Act, relates back and gives certainty to the title of the date of the grant. As that Act was passed two years prior to the Act granting lands to the State of Missouri for the benefit of the railroad, the defendant had the better title on the face of the papers, notwithstanding the certificate to the railroad company for the same land was issued three years before the patent to the State under the Act of 1850. For, while the title under the Swamp-Land Act, being a present grant, takes effect as of the date of that Act, or of the admission of the State into the Union when this occurred afterwards, there can be no claim of an earlier date than that of the Act of 1852, two years later, for the inception of the title of the railroad company." And upon the admissibility of parol testimony to show that the land [508] in the patent was not swamp land, the court said that by the second section of the Act the power and duty were conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior, as the head of the department which administered the affairs of the public lands, of determining what lands were of the description granted, and made his office the tribunal whose decision on that subject was to be controlling. The parol evidence, therefore was held to be inadmissible. 93 U. S. 172 [813].

In commenting upon the case of R. R. Co. v. Smith [supra], upon which reliance was placed for the admission of the parol testimony, the court said: "The admission was placed expressly on the ground that the Secretary of the Interior had neglected or refused to do his duty; that he had made no selections or lists whatever, and would issue no patents, although many years had elapsed since the passage of the Act." "There was no means," it added, "as this court has decided, to compel him to act; and if the party claiming under the statute in that case could not be permitted to prove that the land which the State had conveyed to him as swamp land was in fact such, a total failure of justice would occur, and the entire grant of the State might be defeated by this neglect or refusal to do his duty."

This view of the character of the grant was recognized in Rice v. Sioux City & St. P. R. R. Co. decided at the October Term 1883, 110 U. S. 695 [28: 289]. The question there was whether the Swamp-Land Act extended to Territories upon their subsequent admission as States into the Union. It was held that it did not. Said the court, speaking by the Chief Justice: "That the Swamp-Land Act of 1850 operated as a grant in præsenti to the States then in existence of all the swamp lands in their respective jurisdictions, is well settled;"

citing the cases of R. R. Co. v. Smith, French v. Fyan, [supra], and Martin v. Marks, 97 U. S. 345 [24: 940]. And again: "The grant under the Act of 1850 was to Arkansas and the other States of the Union. Arkansas was an existing State, and the grant was to all the States in præsenti. It was to operate upon existing things, and with reference to an existing [509] state of facts." "It was to take effect at once between an existing grantor and several separate existing grantees."

The result of these decisions is that the grant of 1850 is one in præsenti, passing the title to the lands as of its date, but requiring identification of the lands to render the title perfect; that the action of the secretary in identifying them is conclusive against collateral attack, as the judgment of a special tribunal to which the determination of the matter is intrusted; but, when that officer has neglected or failed to make the identification, it is competent for the grantees of the State, to prevent their rights from being defeated, to identify the lands in any other appropriate mode which will effect that object. A resort to such mode of identification would also seem to be permissible, where the secretary declares his inability to certify the lands to the State for any cause other than a consideration of their character.

The legislation of Congress subsequent to the Act of 1850, for the purpose of giving it effect, has been in consonance with the view stated of the nature of the grant. It has uniformly recognized the paramount character of the State's title, and has endeavored to correct the evils which in many cases followed from the delay of the Secretary of the Interior in identifying the lands, and furnishing to the State the required lists and plats. The Legislatures of the several States in which such lands existed very generally themselves undertook to identify the lands and to dispose of them, and for that purpose passed appropriate legislation for their survey and sale and the issue of patents to the purchasers. Much inconvenience, and in many instances conflicts of title, arose between those claiming under the State and those claiming directly from the United States. To obviate this, on the second of March, 1855, Congress passed an Act "For the relief of purchasers and locators of swamp and overflowed lands." 10 Stat. at L. 634, chap. 147. The Act provided that the President of the United States should cause patents to be issued to purchasers and locators who had made entries of the public lands claimed as swamp and overflowed lands with cash or land warrants, or scrip, prior to the issue of patents to States under the Act of 1850, "Provided, That [510] in all cases where any State through its constituted authorities may have sold or disposed of any tract or tracts of such land to any individual or individuals, and prior to the entry, sale or location of the same under the preemption or other laws of the United States, no patent shall be issued by the President for such tract or tracts until such State through its constituted authorities shall release its claim thereto in such form as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."

The Act also provided "That upon due proof by the authorized agent of the State or States, before the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, that any of the lands purchased were swamp lands within the true intent and meaning of the Act aforesaid, the purchase money shall be paid over to said State or States, and when the lands have been located by warrant or scrip, the said State or States shall be authorized to locate a quantity of like land upon any of the public lands subject to entry at $1.25 an acre, or less, and patents shall issue therefor upon the terms and conditions enumerated in the Act aforesaid."

There is here a plain recognition of the prior right of the State to the swamp lands within her limits, by the declaration that no patent of the United States shall be issued to purchasers from them of such lands without a release from the State, and that, in case of completed purchases from them, the purchase money shall be paid to the State, or if the purchase was made by warrant or in scrip, the State may locate an equal quantity of land upon any other public lands subject to entry. By Act of March 3, 1857, 11 Stat. at L. 251, chap. 117, "To confirm to the several States the swamp and overflowed lands selected under the Act of September 28, 1850, and the Act of March 2, 1849," the Act of March 2, 1855, was continued in force and extended to all entries and locations of lands claimed as swamp, made since its passage.

The Act of Congress of March 12, 1860, 12 Stat. at L. 3, chap. 5, extending the provisions of the Swamp-Land Act to Minnesota and Oregon, recognizes in its second section their [511] right and that of other States to make selections of the swamp lands, or rather to provide for their identification, without waiting for the action of the Secretary of the Interior. That section provides that the selection to be made from lands already surveyed in each of the States should be made within two years from the adjournment of the Legislature of the State at its next session after the date of the Act, and, as to all lands thereafter to be surveyed, within two years from such adjournment at the next session, after notice by the Secretary of the Interior to the Governor of the State that the surveys have been completed and confirmed.

By an Act passed on the 23d of July, 1866, entitled "An Act to Quiet Land Titles in California," 14 Stat. at L. 219, chap. 219, Congress changed the provisions of law for the identification of swamp and overflowed lands in that State. It no longer left their identification to the Secretary of the Interior, but provided for such identification by the joint action of the state and federal authorities.

As early as 1855 the Legislature of California undertook to control and dispose of those lands. The Secretary of the Interior had neglected to make out any list and plats of the lands of this character, and to transmit them to the Governor of the State, as required by the second section of the Act of 1850. The State therefore proceeded in 1855 to assert her ownership over the lands, by providing for their survey and sale, and the issue of patents to the purchasers. Further legislation was also had on the subject in 1858 and 1859; and, in 1861, an Act was passed providing for their reclamation and segregation, making it the duty of the county surveyors to segregate these lands in their re spective counties from the high lands, and to make a complete map of the lands in legal subdivisions of sections and parts of sections, and to transmit a duplicate thereof to the Surveyor-General of the State. Cal. Laws of 1861, 855.

The Act of Congress of 23d of July, 1866, was intended to effect the purpose indicated in its title. Previously to its passage there had been great confusion and uncertainty in relation [512] to land titles in California. This arose with respect to other lands than swamp and overflowed lands, principally from the delay in extending the public surveys of the government, and the action of the state authorities in attempting to select and dispose of the lands granted to her in advance of such surveys. With respect to the swamp and overflowed lands, the confusion had arisen principally from the delay of the Secretary of the Interior in listing such lands to the State, and from inaccuracies of description arising from the want in many parts of the country of the public surveys. The Act of July 23, 1866, tended to remove this uncertainty and confusion, principally by recognizing the action of the State in disposing of the lands granted to her, in cases where such disposition was made to parties in good faith, and did not interfere with previously acquired interests, and by providing a mode for identifying the swamp and overflowed lands in the future without the action of the Secretary of the Interior. The first section of the Act declared that in all cases where the State of California had made selections of any portion of the public domain, in part satisfaction of any grant made to her by Act of Congress, and had disposed of the same to purchasers in good faith under her laws, the lands so selected should be and were thereby confirmed to the State, subject to certain exceptions. This section does not, as supposed by counsel, apply to the swamp and overflowed lands. It was not in satisfaction of a grant of those lands that the State could select lands from any part of the public domain. All she could do was to ascertain where those lands were. She had no power of selection, though that term is sometimes used when merely the power of ascertainment or identification is intended. Secretary Schurz, in Kile v. Tubbs, July 15, 1879, 6 Copp, 108; Secretary Teller, in State of California, Dec. 21, 1883, 2 Decisions of Dep. Int. 643; Sutton v. Fassett, 51 Cal. 12. It is the fourth section of that Act which applies to swamp and overflowed lands. That section, among other things, provides, "That in all cases where township surveys have been, or shall hereafter be, made under authority of the United States, and the plats thereof approved, it shall be the duty [513] of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office to certify over to the State of California, as swamp and overflowed, all the lands represented as such, upon such approved plats, within one year from the passage of this Act, or within one year from the return and approval of such township plats. The commissioner shall direct the United States Surveyor-General for the State of California to examine the segregation maps and surveys of the swamp and overflowed lands made by said State; and where he shall find them to conform to the system of surveys adopted by the United States, he shall construct and approve township plats accordingly, and forward [them] to the General Land-Office for approval." As thus seen, lands represented as swamp and overflowed on the approved plats of township surveys, made under authority of the United States, were, after that date, to be certified to the State; and lands were to be represented as swamp and overflowed on the township plats which were found on the state segregation maps and surveys of such lands; the approval of the township plats to be made by the Land-Office.

Under the Act of California of 1861, the surveyor of the County of Yolo, in 1862, segregated the swamp and overflowed lands in that county, and made a map thereof, entitled "Supplemental Segregation of Swamp and Overflowed Land in Yolo County, by Amos Matthews, County Surveyor," on which all the lands in controversy were designated as swamp and overflowed lands, and deposited the same in the State Surveyor-General's Office. A copy of such segregation map, duly certified by the Surveyor-General of the State, was given in evidence, accompanied with the following certificate of the Surveyor-General of the United States:

"U. S. SURVEYOR-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

"I hereby certify that this diagram has been compared with the original by me, and that the same is a correct transcript of a plat embracing townships eleven north, range two east; twelve north, two east; twelve north, one east (fractional), and eleven north, one east, Mount Diablo meridian, said plat having been filed in [514] this office between the 22d of March and 4th of April, 1872, and being plat of survey made by the County Surveyor of Yolo County, under and in pursuance of the Statutes of the State of California then in force, and showing the segregation lines of the swamp and overflowed land in said townships; and further, that the whole of that portion of said plat is designated thereon as swamp and overflowed land; that I have compared the certificate of approval of said plat with the original indorsed thereon, and that the same is a full, true and correct transcript thereof.

"Witness my hand and the seal of this office this 22d day of September, A. D. 1873.

"[SEAL.] J. R. HARDENBURGH, U. S. Surveyor-General, California."

Objection was taken to a copy of this map, because the one deposited in the office of the Surveyor-General of the State was not marked as filed. If such was the case, the omission was one of that officer, and could not affect the validity of the map as evidence. It was in proof that the county surveyor deposited the map in that office, and that ever since it had remained there. No other segregation map was ever in the office.

On the first of July, 1861, the swamp and overflowed lands in the county, in controversy in this case, and designated as such on this map, subsequently made, were purchased by different parties from the State, as shown by certificates of purchase issued to them bearing that date, which were produced in evidence These certificates were assigned to the plaintiff. They are made by statute prima facie evidence of legal title in the holders thereof; and upon them ejectment can be maintained for the land described. Act of April 13, 1859; Richter v. Riley, 22 Cal. 689.

On the 10th of January, 1866, a plat or map of the township, in which the lands in contro-[515] versy are situated, was approved by L. Upson, United States Surveyor-General for California, on which map only one parcel of the lands was designated as swamp and overflowed land. The map showed on its face that the survey of the township was made in the field, in 1864. On the 4th of April, 1872, J. R. Hardenburgh, United States Surveyor-General for California, who had succeeded Mr. Upson, compared this map with the segregation map of swamp and overflowed lands in the township, made by the surveyor of the county under the laws of the State, which conformed to the system of surveys adopted by the United States, and amended the township plat in accordance with the segregation, and forwarded the same to the General Land-Office, where it was officially used as an approved plat. Upon this amended map all the lands in controversy are designated as swamp and overflowed. The following letter of the Surveyor-General accompanied the map:

"U. S. SURVEYOR-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
SAN FRANCISCO, April 19, 1872.

"Hon. WILLIS DRUMMOND,
Commissioner General Land-Office, Washington, D. C.

"SIR: I transmit in a separate roll by to-day's mail certified plats, also certified descriptive lists, of the following townships, showing all tracts which the State of California claimed as swamp and overflowed prior to July 23, 1866; also showing the segregation of swamp and overflowed lands made by the United States, viz: Township eleven north, range one east; township eleven north, range two east; township twelve north, range two east, Mount Diablo meridian. The lists of said tracts contain annotations in red ink made by the Register of the U. S. Land-Office at Marysville, stating all titles to said lands adverse to the claims of the State of California, together with the register's certificate testifying to the correctness of such annotations, as appears from the records of this office.

"These plats and lists are sent you in accordance with the instructions contained in your letter of July 7, 1871, which enclosed for my [516] guidance a copy of a letter addressed to L. Upson, U. S. Surveyor-General, dated Sept. 18, 1866.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"J. R. HARDENBURGH,
U. S. Surveyor-General for California."

The commissioner, Mr. Williamson, who succeeded Mr. Drummond in office, certifies, under date of January 12, 1878, to a copy of this plat of township eleven north, range two east, of Mount Diablo meridian, as one received with the Surveyor-General's letter of April 19, 1872, and "since which time it has been officially used as approved plat made in accordance with section 2488, U. S. Revised Statutes." This section declares that "It shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office to certify over to the State of California, as swamp and overflowed lands, all the lands represented as such upon the approved township surveys and plats, whether made before or after the 23d day of July, 1866, under the authority of the United States." Subsequently, in July, 1877, the State Surveyor-General forwarded to the Commissioner of the Land-Office certified copies of certain swamp-land surveys, with a statement that the lands described in them were all sold by the State in good faith as swamp and overflowed lands prior to July 23, 1866, and requested that the lands not already listed, which included those in controversy, be certified to the State. The commissioner replied that the lands in the township had all been disposed of, and patents issued to settlers under the laws of the United States, and upon that ground alone he refused the application. This refusal was approved by Mr. Schurz, Secretary of the Interior, the latter observing, in justification of it, that it had been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that a patent, when issued and delivered to and accepted by the grantee, passed the legal title to the land, and all control of the Executive Department over it ceased. "If any lawful reason exists," said the Secretary in his communication to the commissioner, "why the patent should be canceled or annulled, such as fraud on the part of the grantee, or mistake or misconstruction of [517] the law on the part of your office, the appropriate remedy is by a bill in chancery, and an action may be maintained by the United States, or any contesting claimant; but you are not authorized to reconsider the facts on which a patent was issued, and to recall or rescind it, or to issue one to another party for the same tract," citing U. S. v. Hughes, 52 U. S. 11 How. 552 [13: 809]; U. S. v. Stone, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 525 [17: 765]; Hughes v. U. S. 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 232 [18: 303]; and Moore v. Robbins, 96 U. S. 530 [24: 848]. There was no suggestion by either the commissioner or the secretary that the lands were not swamp and overflowed as designated upon the township plat.

The question, therefore, is whether, upon the proof thus presented of the segregation of the lands in controversy as swamp and overflowed lands by the authorities of the State of California, and their designation as such lands on a plat of the township made by the Surveyor-General of the United States, and approved by him, and forwarded to the General Land-Office, pursuant to the fourth section of the Act of 1866, and approved by the commissioner, as shown by its official use, the plaintiff can maintain an action for the recovery of the lands, they never having been certified over to the State, as required by section 2488 of the Revised Statutes, or patented to her under the Act of 1850. According to the decisions we have cited, the holders of the certificates of purchase had a good title to the lands if in fact they were swamp and overflowed lands on the 28th of September, 1850.

The certificates were conclusive as evidence against the State that they were such lands. The Statute of California, as already stated, makes them prima facie evidence of legal title to the premises in the holders, and upon them ejectment can be maintained in the state courts. The case of the plaintiff was therefore prima facie established by the production of the certificates, and showing their assignment to him. Richter v. Riley, 22 Cal. 689, cited above.

The representation of the lands as swamp and overflowed on the approved township plat would be conclusive as against the United States that they were such lands, if they had [518] not been patented before the return of such township plat to the land-office. . The Act of Congress intended that the segregation maps prepared by authority of the State, and filed in the State Surveyor-General's office, if found upon examination by the United States Surveyor-General to be made in accordance with the public surveys of the General Government, should be taken as evidence that the lands designated thereon as swamp and overflowed were such in fact, except where this would interfere with previously acquired interests. In this case the defendants trace title by patents of the United States purporting to be issued to settlers under the preemption laws, in 1866, 1867, 1868 and 1871, upon declaratory statements made in 1864, three years after the purchase from the State by the grantors of the plaintiff, and two years after a map segregating these lands had been made by the surveyor of the county, pursuant to the law of the State, and deposited in the Surveyor-General's office. These patents were evidence that whatever title the United States then held passed to the patentees, and, as against a mere intruder without claim of title from a paramount source, were conclusive that the lands were of the character which by the patents they were represented to be. This was the case of Ehrhardt v. Hogaboom, 115 U. S. 67 [29: 346]. There the plaintiff claimed by a patent issued to his grantor under the preemption laws. The defendant admitted he was in possession of twenty acres, and contended that these were swamp and overflowed lands which passed to the State under the Act of 1850. It appeared, however, that the certificate of purchase which he produced did not embrace the lands in controversy, and his offer to prove the character of the land as swamp and overflowed by parol was rejected. The court said: "He was, as to the twenty acres, a mere intruder without claim or color of title. He was therefore in no position to call in question the validity of the patent of the United States for those acres, and require the plaintiff to vindicate the action of the officers of the land department in issuing it." And again: "It is the duty of the land department, of which the secretary is the head, to determine whether land patented to a settler is of the class subject to settlement under the [519] preemption laws; and his judgment as to this fact is not open to contestation in an action at law by a mere intruder without title." But this doctrine has no application where a party, whether plaintiff or defendant, asserts title to premises in controversy from a paramount source, or by a prior conveyance from a common source. The doctrine that all presumptions are to be indulged in support of proceedings upon which a patent is issued, and which is not open to collateral attack in an action of ejectment, has no application where it is shown that the land in controversy had, before the initiation of the proceedings upon which the patent was issued, passed from the United States. The previous transfer is a fact which may be established in an action at law as well as in a suit in equity. As we said in Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 641 [26: 876]: "When we speak of the conclusive presumptions attending a patent for lands, we assume that it was issued in a case where the department had jurisdiction to act and execute it; that is to say, in a case where the lands belonged to the United States and provision had been made by law for their sale. If they never were public property, or had previously been disposed of, or if Congress had made no provision for their sale, or had reserved them, the department would have no jurisdiction to transfer them, and its attempted conveyance of them would be inoperative and void, no matter with what seeming regularity the forms of law may have been observed. The action of the department would, in that event, be like that of any other special tribunal not having jurisdiction of a case which it had assumed to decide. Matters of this kind, disclosing a want of jurisdiction, may be considered by a court of law. In such cases the objection to the patent reaches beyond the action of the special tribunal, and goes to the existence of a subject upon which it was competent to act."

And again, in the same case, we said, p. 646 [878]: "A patent may be collaterally impeached in any action, and its operation as a conveyance defeated, by showing that the department had no jurisdiction to dispose of the lands; that is, that the law did not provide for selling them, or that they had been reserved from sale or dedicated to special purposes, or had been previously transferred to others. In establish- [520] ing any of these particulars the judgment of the department upon matters properly before it is not assailed, nor is the regularity of its proceedings called into question; but its authority to act at all is denied, and shown never to have existed."

"There are cases," said Chief Justice Marshall, "in which a grant is absolutely void, as when the State has no title to the thing granted, or when the officer had no authority to issue the grant. In such cases the validity of the grant is necessarily examinable at law." Polk's Lessee v. Wendal, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 87, 99 [3: 665, 669]. Indeed, it may be said to be common knowledge that patents of the United States for lands which they had previously granted, reserved for sale, or appropriated, are void. Easton v. Salisbury, 62 U. S. 21 How. 426 [16: 181]; Reichart v. Felps, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 160 [18: 849]; Best v. Polk, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 112 [21: 805]. It would be a most extraordinary doctrine if the holder of a conveyance of land from a State were precluded from establishing his title simply because the United States may have subsequently conveyed the land to another, and especially from showing that years before they had granted the property to the State, and thus were without title at the time of their subsequent conveyance. As this court said in New Orleans v. United States: "It would be a dangerous doctrine to consider the issuing of a grant as conclusive evidence of right in the power which issued it. On its face it is conclusive, and cannot be controverted: but if the thing granted was not in the grantor, no right passes to the grantee. A grant has been frequently issued by the United States for land which had been previously granted, and the second grant has been held to be inoperative." 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 663, 731 [9: 573, 600].

The court below held, and placed its decision upon the ground, that, because the Commissioner of the General Land-Office had not certified the lands in controversy to the State as swamp and overflowed, when this action was commenced in 1870, there was no title in the State by the grant of 1850 which could be enforced, thus making the investiture of title depend upon the act of the commissioner instead of the Act of Congress; whereas, the certificate of that officer, [521] when the previous requirements of the law have been complied with, is only an official recognition that the lands are of the character designated, and of the completeness of their segregation. The decision is in conflict with its previous decisions, and with the adjudged cases to which our attention has been called.

In Sacramento Valley Reclamation Co. v. Cook, decided as late as 1882, that court recognized the swamp-land grant of 1850 as one in præsenti. Its language was: "It is as well settled as anything can be by the courts that the donation of swamp and overflowed lands by the United States to the States in which such lands were situated at the date of the passage of the Act of September 28, 1850, 'was a grant in præsenti, by which the title to those lands passed at once to the States in which they lay, except as to States admitted into the Union after its passage,'" citing French v. Fyan, 93 U. S. 169 [23: 812].

For the error in holding that the certificate of the commissioner was necessary to pass the title of the demanded premises to the State, the case must go back for a new trial, when the parties will be at liberty to show whether or not the lands in controversy were in fact swamp and overflowed on the day that the Swamp-Land Act of 1850 took effect. If they are proved to have been such lands at that date, they were not afterwards subject to preemption by settlers. They were not afterwards public lands at the disposal of the United States. Parties settling upon such lands must be deemed to have done so with notice of the title of the State, and, after the segregation map was deposited with the Surveyor-General of the State, with notice also that they were actually segregated and claimed by the State as such lands.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

[637] NEW JERSEY STEAMBOAT COMPANY,
Plff. in Err.,
v.
LEONARD A. BROCKETT.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 637-650.)

Common carriers of passengers—liability for acts of servants—enforcement of reasonable regulations—reasonable force, question for jury—evidence res gestæ—measure of damages.

1. A common carrier of passengers undertakes absolutely to protect them against the misconduct of its own servants engaged in executing the contract.

2. In the enforcement of the reasonable regulations established by the carrier for the conduct of its business, the servant may be obliged to use force; but the law will not protect the carrier if its servants use excessive or unnecessary force in so doing.

3. In the case presented, it is held: that the question whether the defendant's servants, in executing a regulation as to deck passengers, used unwarrantable force and thereby caused the injuries complained of, was one peculiarly for the jury in view of the serious conflict of evidence; that the instructions of the court fairly presented the case to the jury, and that certain declarations, made by one servant of the defendant while assisting another in enforcing said regulation, constituted part of the res gestæ.

Argued April 22, 1887. Decided May 2, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. James Lowndes and W. P. Prentice, for plaintiff in error:

On the complaint and the evidence a verdict should have been directed for the plaintiff in error.

Marshall v. Hubbard, 117 U. S. 415 (29:919); Gilmer v. Higley, 110 U. S. 47 (28: 62); Randall v. Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. 109 U. S. 479 (27: 1004).

The question upon the evidence was for the judge—whether the plaintiff's statement, uncorroborated, was sufficient to support a verdict in the face of the admitted facts and the other testimony by which it was contradicted.

Randall v. Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. supra; Board of Comrs. v. Clark, 94 U. S. 279 (24: 60); Vanderbilt v. Richmond Turnpike Co. 2 N. Y. 479; Searles v. Manhattan R. R. Co. 101 N. Y. 661; Culhane v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. R. Co. 60 N. Y. 133; Higgins v. McCrea, 116 U. S. 671 (29: 764).

Mr. Eugene E. Sheldon, for defendant in error:

A common carrier by its contract with its passenger undertakes to carry him safely and to treat him respectfully, and undertakes to protect the passenger against any injury arising from the negligence or willful misconduct of its servants during the passage.

Stewart v. Brooklyn & C. R. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 588.

The fact that Brockett was out of his place in being on the freight "abaft the shaft," even if he had known of the rule, cannot prevent a recovery.

The master is liable for the acts of the servant acting as such, though done in disobedience to orders of the master.

Phila. & R. R. R. Co. v. Derby, 55 U. S. 14 How. 468 (14: 502).

And in case of a passenger the master, being a common carrier, is liable for acts of a servant outside of the scope of his employment.

Stewart's Case, 90 N. Y. 588.

Even if Brockett had known he had no right where he was, he would not from that fact lose his right of action.

Sandford v. Eighth Ave. R. R. Co. and Rounds v. Delaware, L. & W. R. R. Co. supra.

This action was brought to recover damages sustained by the defendant in error, the plaintiff below, in consequence of personal injuries inflicted upon him by the employés of the plaintiff in error, a carrier of freight and passengers between the Cities of Albany and New York, in the State of New York. A verdict and judgment having been rendered for the sum of $5,500, the case is brought here for review, upon the ground that the court below committed errors of law in the conduct of the trial.

The plaintiff avers that he was received by the defendant as a deck passenger upon its boat, The Dean Richmond, at Albany, and that, in consideration of his having paid the price established for passengers of that class, it undertook to carry him safely to the City of New York, and thereby became bound that its servants and employés on said boat should not needlessly injure him while engaged in the discharge of their duties; that the defendant did not keep its contract, but broke the same, in that, by its servants on said boat, it needlessly and severely wounded him in his person during the voyage to New York, whereby he was [639] put to great expense for surgical attendance, and whereby, also, incurable injuries were inflicted upon him. These allegations are accompanied by a statement of the circumstances under which, the plaintiff insists, the alleged wrongs were committed.

The answer denies generally that the Company's agents or servants were guilty of negligence or improper conduct, and states "that the plaintiff paid for a deck passage, and it received him on its boat as a deck passenger for passage to New York on a certain part of the boat allotted to deck passengers, as was well known to the plaintiff, and subject to long established rules and regulations of the defendant, including that mentioned in the complaint, of which the plaintiff had due and full notice; that the said rules and regulations were reasonable, and the defendant's officers and employés on the said boat were charged with the duty of enforcing them in a reasonable and proper way, without unnecessary force or violence, and the said rules and regulations and the officers and employés of the boat in uniform were well known to the plaintiff; that the plaintiff did not remain on the part of the boat allotted to deck passengers, and did not obey the said reasonable rules and regulations of the defendant, but refused so to do, and contrary to the peace, quiet, good order and safety of the said boat and its passengers, made a disturbance on the said boat; and the defendant neither used nor authorized any undue or unnecessary force or violence in the enforcement of the aforesaid rule and regulation, but the contrary thereof; and the plaintiff was not injured by any of the defendant's officers, employés, or agents, as alleged in the complaint."

[640] We will not extend this opinion by a recital of all the facts and circumstances established by the proof. It is sufficient to say that there was evidence tending to sustain both the allegations of the complaint and the averments in the answer. In view of the serious conflict in the statements of witnesses, the case was one peculiarly for the determination of a jury, under appropriate instructions as to the law. The court, therefore, rightfully refused to direct a verdict for the Company, unless, as claimed, the plaintiff, according to his complaint and the evidence, had no cause of action.

It appears from the complaint that the Company had a regulation restricting deck passengers to a particular part of the boat; but of the existence of that rule, the plaintiff averred, he did not, at the time, have notice. It also appears by uncontradicted evidence that, upon the ticket purchased by the plaintiff were printed the words "deck passengers not allowed abaft the shaft," and that placards, in different parts of the boat, indicated the place on it which such passengers were prohibited from occupying. As the plaintiff was "abaft the shaft" when injured, no case, it is insisted, was made that would sustain an action upon the contract of transportation; consequently, it is contended, the request to instruct the jury to find for the defendant should have been granted. This argument assumes that the plaintiff could not claim protection under the contract for safe transportation in respect to an injury done him by the Company's servants while he was upon a part of the boat other than that to which he was restricted by the rule or regulation printed on his ticket. This position cannot be sustained. We shall not stop to inquire whether the regulation in question is shown to be a part of the contract for transportation; and we assume, for the purposes of this case, that the plaintiff stipulated that, during the voyage, he would remain upon the part of the boat to which deck passengers were assigned; still, it would not follow that his violation of that stipulation deprived him of the benefit of his contract. Such violation only gave the carrier the right to compel him to conform to its regulation, or, upon his refusing to do so, to require him to leave the boat, using, in either case, only such force as the circumstances reasonably justified. [645] If the injuries necessarily arose from his violation of the regulation established for deck passengers, the carrier would not be responsible therefor. But if they were not the necessary result of his being, at the time, on a part of the boat where he had no right to be, and were directly caused by the improper conduct of the carrier's servants, either while acting within the scope of their general employment, or when in the discharge of special duties imposed upon them, he is not precluded from claiming the benefit of the contract for safe transportation.

The plaintiff was entitled, in virtue of that contract, to protection against the misconduct or negligence of the carrier's servants. Their misconduct or negligence whilst transacting the Company's business, and when acting within the general scope of their employment, is, of necessity, to be imputed to the Corporation, which constituted them agents for the performance of its contract with the passenger. Whether the act of the servant be one of omission or commission, whether negligent or fraudulent, "if," as was adjudged in Phila. & R. R. R. Co. v. Derby, 55 U. S. 14 How. 486 [14: 509], "it be done in the course of his employment, the master is liable; and it makes no difference that the master did not authorize or even know of the servant's act or neglect, or even if he disapproved or forbade it, he is equally liable, if the act be done in the course of his servant's employment." See also Phila. W. & Balt. R. R. Co. v. Quigley, 62 U. S. 21 How. 210 [16: 75]. "This rule," the Court of Appeals of New York well says, "is founded upon public policy and convenience. Every person is bound to use due care in the conduct of his business. If his business is committed to an agent or servant, the obligation is not changed." Higgins v. Watervliet Turnpike Co. 46 N. Y. 27. The principle is peculiarly applicable as between carriers and passengers; for, as held by the same court in Stewart v. Brooklyn & C. R. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 591, a common carrier is bound, as far as practicable, to protect its passengers, while being conveyed, from violence committed by strangers and copassengers, and undertakes absolutely to [646] protect them against the misconduct of its own servants engaged in executing the contract.

What will be misconduct on the part of its servants towards a passenger cannot be defined by a general rule applicable to every case, but must depend upon the particular circumstances in which they are required to act. In the enforcement of reasonable regulations established by the carrier for the conduct of its business, the servant may be obliged to use force. But the law will not protect the carrier if the servant uses excessive or unnecessary force. This doctrine is well illustrated in Sanford v. Eighth Ave. R. R. Co. 23 N. Y. 345. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff's intestate got upon a street railroad car in the night time and, after being shown to a seat, refused, without sufficient cause, to pay his fare. He was ordered to leave the car and, failing to do so, the conductor led him to the forward platform and, without stopping the car, forcibly ejected him therefrom. The injuries received by the passenger resulted in his death. The court said: "It must be conceded that the conductor had a right to expel the intestate for the reason that he would not pay his fare when asked to do so. But this was not a right to be exercised in a manner regardless of all consequences. A person cannot be thrown from a railroad train in rapid motion without the most imminent danger to life; and, although he may be justly liable to expulsion, he may lawfully resist an attempt to expel him in such a case. As the refusal of a passenger to pay his fare will not justify homicide, so it fails to justify any act which in itself puts human life in peril; and the passenger has the same right to repel an attempt to eject him, when such attempt will endanger him, that he has to resist a direct attempt to take his life. The great law of self preservation so plainly establishes this conclusion that no further argument is necessary. * * * It is said that the intestate offered resistance when he was thus seized. But this he had a right to do in order to save life, which he had not forfeited by refusing to pay the fare. He was liable to be expelled, and the conduct-[647] or's assault would have been justified if the car had been stopped, and the expulsion had been made without unnecessary violence. But, as the conductor has no right to make the assault when he did and as he did, so the law will justify such resistance as was offered to that assault." See also Hoffman v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 24; Rounds v. Delaware etc. R. R. Co. 64 N. Y. 129, 134; Lynch v. Metropolitan R. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 77; Ramsden v. Boston & A. R. R. Co. 104 Mass. 121; Noble v. Cunningham, 74 Ill. 53; North Western R. R. Co. v. Hack, 66 Ill. 242; Robinson v. Webb, 11 Bush. 464, 482.

In the present case the jury were instructed, in substance, that the plaintiff had no right to be in any part of the boat except that assigned to deck passengers, and that the carrier's servants had the right—using no more force than was necessary—to remove him from the place where he was found by the watchman. Referring to the testimony of the plaintiff, the court observed: "He says that he went upon the bales of hops, remained there a short time, went to sleep, and was awakened by the watchman, Thiel, striking him with a cane; that he struck him first on the feet, afterwards in the face, and told him to get down. He asked Thiel if he was doing any harm there, and asked to be allowed to stay. Part of the answer was, 'Get down, come down.' The assault upon him continuing, he then put up his satchel for protection, and was thereupon caught by the collar of his coat and pulled headlong from the freight, his shoulder striking one of the barrels standing near, dislocating it or causing the injury which has been described. He says that upon regaining his feet, he was again struck by the watchman. Soon after another officer of the boat came and he was pushed towards the shaft and told that was the part of the boat for him to remain in; that he went to the barber shop, and there for the first time read his ticket and saw the requirement in reference to deck passengers. That very briefly is the statement of the plaintiff." The court proceeded: "If you believe that statement to be true, then I say, as a matter of law, that there was more force than was necessary to accomplish the result, and the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict." To this last part of the charge the defendant took an exception. [648]
But we perceive no ground upon which the exception can properly rest. If the statements of the plaintiff were true, then neither argument nor citation of authorities is necessary to show that undue force was used by the Company's servants. And it was the right of the court to so instruct the jury.

But that the jury might also have in mind the case as made by the defendant, the court said: "On the other hand, you have the testimony of the witness Thiel, who says he came to the freight two or three times before the transaction and told plaintiff to get down; that the other passengers all got down; that on the third occasion he stepped on a box and told him to come down; that the plaintiff, instead of doing so, endeavored to climb higher or get away from him; that the plaintiff kicked him in the breast, and in the excitement he caught hold of him, and in the struggle which ensued, the boxes, the plaintiff, and the witness came down together in a crash upon the floor. If you believe that statement, then the plaintiff brought this assault upon himself; it was an unavoidable accident, and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. Other witnesses have been called, who in part corroborate the story of the watchman, and in some particulars corroborate the story of the plaintiff."

The whole case was thus fairly placed before the jury, upon the issue as to whether the defendant's servants, in executing its regulation as to deck passengers, used unwarrantable force and thereby caused the injuries of which the plaintiff complains.

One objection made by the defendant to the admission of evidence deserves to be noticed. The plaintiff in his evidence described the manner in which, as is contended, he was dragged by the watchman from the boxes. After stating that he was thrown to the floor, and was being roughly pushed by the watchman, he proceeded: "Then I saw another man coming with the uniform of the boat on, and the cap, and he said: 'All such men as you ought to be killed.' I says, 'What do you want to kill me for?' he says, 'You farmers are so stingy; you are too stingy to buy a state room, and you [649] ought to be killed.' I said, 'You ought not call me stingy;' then he said, 'Have you looked at your ticket?' I think he had 'Third assistant mate' on his cap, the cap had a yellow cord, the same as the officers of the boat wore." It appeared, in proof, that the person here referred to was one of the mates of The Richmond.

The defendant objected, at the trial, to the competency of the statements of the mate. The objection was overruled and an exception taken. It is now insisted that the defendant is not responsible for the brutal language of its servants, and that the declarations of the mate to the plaintiff were not competent as evidence against the carrier. We are of opinion that these declarations constitute a part of the res gestæ. They were made by one servant of the defendant while assisting another servant in enforcing its regulation as to deck passengers. They were made when the watchman and the mate, according to the evidence of the plaintiff, were both in the very act of violently "pushing" him, while in a helpless condition, to that part of the boat assigned to deck passengers. Plainly, therefore, they had some relation to the inquiry whether the enforcement of that regulation was attended with unnecessary or cruel severity. They accompanied and explained the acts of the defendant's servants out of which directly arose the injuries inflicted upon the plaintiff. Vicksburg & M. R. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 119 U. S. 99, 105 [ante, 299, 302]; Ohio & Miss. R. R. Co. v. Porter, 92 Ill. 437, 439; Toledo & Wabash R. Co. v. Goddard, 25 Ind. 190, 191. As bearing upon this point, it may be stated that the jury were instructed that the case, as presented, did not authorize vindictive or punitive damages, and that in no event could they award the plaintiff any larger amount than would reasonably compensate him for the injuries received; thus guarding against undue weight being given to the harsh words of the Company's servants, apart from their acts.

Other questions arise upon the admission of evidence against the objection of the defendant; upon the refusal of the court to grant requests for instructions in its behalf; and upon certain parts of the charge to which it excepted. In our opinion none of these questions require [650 consideration; and the action of the court, in respect to them, constitute no ground for the reversal of the judgment. The charge of the court embodied all that need have been said. It correctly stated the propositions of law arising in the case. No substantial error having been committed, the judgment is affirmed.

THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States,

AT

OCTOBER TERM, 1886.

LEHIGH WATER COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

CORPORATION OF THE BOROUGH OF EASTON AND THE BOARD OF WATER COMMISSIONERS OF THE BOROUGH OF EASTON.

121 US 388.

Constitutional law—obligation of contracts—impairment of—law enacted prior to making of contract—jurisdiction of this court—rights of water company not exclusive—Constitution and Statutes of Pennsylvania.

1. The provision of the Constitution which declares that "no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts" does not apply to a law enacted prior to the making of the contract, the obligation of which is claimed to be impaired.

2. The judgment of a state court, construing a contract, is not reviewable by this court, unless, under said provision of the Constitution and existing statutes, such judgment, in terms or by its necessary operation, gives effect to some provision of the State Constitution or legislative enactment, which is claimed by the unsuccessful party to impair the obligation of the particular contract in question.

3. Under the Constitution and legislation of Pennsylvania the Lehigh Water Company is not entitled to an exclusive right to maintain water works in the Borough of Easton, said Borough itself having the authority to maintain a public system of water works under the Act of 1867, which does not impair the rights derived by the Company from the Act of 1874.

Argued April 7, 1887. Decided April 18, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Edward J. Fox and Edward J. Fox, Jr., for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Robert I. Jones and William S. Kirkpatrick, for Board of Water Commissioners of Easton, defendants in error.

Frank Reeder and William Beidelman, for Borough of Easton, defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

For many years prior to June 21, 1880, the Lehigh Water Company, a corporation organized, under the laws of Pennsylvania, by the purchasers at judicial sale of the rights, powers, privileges, and franchises of the West Ward Company, also a Pennsylvania corporation, maintained a system of water works whereby the inhabitants of the Borough of Easton, in that Commonwealth, were supplied with water for domestic and business purposes. On that day, it accepted the provisions of an Act of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, approved April 20, 1874, entitled "An Act to Provide for the Incorporation and Regulation of Certain Corporations." By such acceptance it acquired the privileges, immunities, franchises, and powers conferred by the Act upon corporations created under it.

It also became entitled to the benefit of the third clause of the 84th section of that Act, relating to water and gas companies.

That clause provides:

"The right to have and enjoy the franchises and privileges of such incorporation within the district or locality covered by its charter shall be an exclusive one; and no other company shall be incorporated for that purpose until the said corporation shall have from its earnings realized and divided among its stockholders, during five years, a dividend equal to eight per centum per annum upon its capital stock; Provided, That the said corporations shall at all times furnish pure gas and water; and any citizen using the same may make complaint of impurity or deficiency in quantity, or both, to the court of common pleas of the proper county, by bill filed, and, after hearing the parties touching the same, the said court shall have power to make such order in the premises as may seem just and equitable, and may dismiss the complaints or compel the corporation to correct the evil complained of."

The seventh clause of the same section provides: "It shall be lawful, at any time after twenty years from the introduction of water or gas, as the case may be, into any place as aforesaid, for the town, borough, city or district in which the said company shall be located, to become the owners of said works and the property of said company by paying therefor the net cost of erecting and maintaining the same, with interest thereon at the rate of ten per centum per annum, deducting from said interest all dividends theretofore declared." Laws Pa. 1874, pp. 78, 93.

After the acceptance by the Lehigh Water Company of the provisions of the Act of 1874, the constituted authorities of the Borough of Easton, in conformity with a vote of its qualified electors, and under power conferred by Acts of the General Assembly, approved March 12, 1869, and April 15, 1867 (Pamph. Laws Pa. 1867, pp. 412, 1254), determined to construct and itself maintain a system of public works for supplying its inhabitants with water.

This suit was brought by the Lehigh Water Company for the purpose of enjoining the authorities of the Borough from constructing or providing such works or from appropriating money therefor. The suit proceeds upon these grounds: 1. That the Acts of 1867 ceased to be valid after the adoption of the present Constitution of Pennsylvania. 2. That the Lehigh Water Company acquired, by the Act of 1874, the exclusive right to erect and maintain water works for supplying water to the inhabitants of Easton. 3. That the Acts of 1867, if not superseded by the Constitution of Pennsylvania, impaired the obligation of the contract created between that Commonwealth and the Company by the latter's acceptance of the provisions of the Act of 1874; consequently, they were void under the National Constitution.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, affirming the judgment of the court of original jurisdiction dismissing the suit, held that the exclusive right acquired by the Lehigh Water Company, under the Act of 1874, was exclusive only against other private water companies, and that the legislation did not intend to prohibit a city, borough, or other municipal corporation from providing its inhabitants with water by means of works constructed by itself from money in its own treasury; also, that the Acts of 1867 were neither repealed by the Act of 1874, nor superseded by the State Constitution.

In reference to the remaining ground relied upon by the Company the state court said:

"The third ground of objection is wholly without merit. By constructing water works of its own the Borough will not destroy the franchises of the plaintiff Company. It may impair their value, and probably will do so; but of this the Company have no legal cause of complaint. The granting of a new charter to a new corporation may sometimes render valueless the franchises of an existing corporation; but unless the State by contract has precluded itself from such new grant the incidental injury can constitute no obstacle. Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 420 [9: 773]; Turnpike Co. v. Maryland, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 210 [18: 180]; Piscataqua Bridge v. New Hampshire Bridge, 7 N. H. 35. No contract has been shown between the Water Company and the State by which the latter is precluded from granting to the Borough of Easton the privilege of erecting works to supply its citizens with water."

The only question presented by the record which this court can properly consider is whether the judgment below denies to the plaintiff in error any right or privilege secured by that provision of the Constitution of the United States which declares that "No State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts." Obviously, this clause cannot be invoked for the reversal of the judgment below. It is equally clear that the law of the State to which the Constitution refers in that clause must be one enacted after the making of the contract, the obligation of which is claimed to be impaired. Neither the Lehigh Water Company nor its predecessor had, under any statute enacted prior to 1874, an exclusive right to maintain water works in the Borough of Easton for supplying its inhabitants with water. Nor did the grant to the Borough, in the Acts of 1867, of the power to construct and maintain a system of public water works, infringe any right or privilege which the plaintiff in error then had under its charter. But the claim is that the exclusive privilege acquired by the Company under the Statute of 1874 was impaired in value by the Acts passed in 1867. It cannot, however, with propriety, be said that the obligation of a contract made with the State in 1874 was impaired by statutes enacted in 1867. Whether the former repealed, by implication, the Acts of 1867, presents no question arising under the National Constitution. That is a question simply of statutory construction, which the state court was competent to determine, and whose judgment in respect thereto is not subject to re-examination in this court. Had the Borough of Easton been authorized by a statute enacted after the Lehigh Water Company had acquired the exclusive privilege given by the Act of 1874, then this court would have been compelled to decide, upon its independent judgment, whether the latter applied only to private corporations; for, in such case, the determination of that question would be involved in the inquiry whether there was a contract between the State and the Company, and, if there was a contract, whether its obligation was impaired by a law subsequently enacted. Louisville Gas Co. v. Citizens Gas Co. 115 U. S. 683, 697 [29: 510, 515].

The argument in behalf of the Company seems to rest upon the general idea that this court, under the statutes defining its appellate jurisdiction, may re-examine the judgment of the state court in every case involving the enforcement of contracts. But this view is unsound. The state court may erroneously determine questions arising under a contract which constitutes the basis of the suit before it; it may hold a contract void which in our opinion is valid; it may adjudge a contract to be valid which in our opinion is void; or its interpretation of the contract may in our opinion be radically wrong; but in neither of such cases would the judgment be reviewable by this court under the clause of the Constitution protecting the obligation of contracts against impairment by state legislation, and under the existing statutes defining and regulating its jurisdiction, unless that judgment, in terms or by its necessary operation, gives effect to some provision of the State Constitution, or some legislative enactment of the State, which is claimed by the unsuccessful party to impair the obligation of the particular contract in question. R. R. Co. v. Rock, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 177, 181 [18: 351, 352]; R. R. Co. v. McClure, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 511, 515 [19: 997, 998]; Knox v. Exchange Bank, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 379, 383 [20: 414, 415]; Delmas v. Ins. Co. 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 661, 665 [20: 757, 759]; University v. People, 99 U. S. 309, 319 [25: 387, 388]; Chicago Life Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 574, 582 [28: 1084, 1087].

The judgment is affirmed.

JOHN NOONAN ET AL., Appts.,
v.
CALEDONIA GOLD MINING COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 121.)

Mines—location and development within Indian Reservation—subsequent compliance with laws—relinquishment of reservation—specific objection to evidence when necessary—pleading and practice—codefendant added at trial—Dakota Code.

1. Where a party was in possession of a mining claim in the Black Hills within the Indian Reservation prior to the relinquishment of February 28, 1877, with the requisite discovery, with the surface boundary sufficiently marked, with the notice of location posted, and with a disclosed vein of ore, he could, by adopting what had been done, causing a proper record to be made, and performing the amount of labor or making the improvements necessary to hold the claim, date his rights from that day.

2. Where an objection to the introduction of evidence is so general as not to indicate the specific grounds upon which it is made, it is unavailing on appeal, unless it could not have been obviated at the trial.

3. Under the Code of Civil Procedure of Dakota a codefendant may be added by amendment of the pleadings at the trial; and a judgment against him will be sustained if allegations supporting it appear somewhere in the record.

Argued Mar. 29, 30, 1887. Decided Apr. 18, 1887.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Dakota. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Field:

This is an action to determine the rights of the parties to mining ground in Lawrence County, in the Territory of Dakota. In April, 1878, one of the defendants below, and of the appellants here, John Noonan, asserted ownership to a tract of mineral land in that county, bearing the name of the Bobtail Lode. It was of great value, and he desired to obtain a patent of the United States for it. He, therefore, pursued the course prescribed in such cases by sections 2325 and 2326 of the Revised Statutes; and, on the 20th of that month, filed the necessary application in the proper land-office of the district.

At the same time Henry Lackey and eight other persons asserted ownership of mining ground known as the Caledonia Lode, which conflicted with the Bobtail claim, as alleged, to the extent of three acres and fifty-seven hundredths of an acre. They, therefore, in May, 1878, filed in the land-office an adverse claim to the application of Noonan; and, in June following, brought the present action, to determine their respective rights to the disputed ground.

Subsequently, these adverse claimants sold their interest in the Caledonia Lode to Thomas Bell, of San Francisco; and he conveyed the property to the Caledonia Gold Mining Company, a corporation organized under the laws of California. Upon application to the court, this Company was substituted as plaintiff in the action, without prejudice to the rights of the defendants. An amended complaint was thereupon filed in its name, and substituted for the original one. It alleges the incorporation of the plaintiff under the laws of California; its compliance with the laws of Dakota relating to foreign corporations, to enable it to transact business, and to acquire, hold, and dispose of property in the Territory; the transfer of the Caledonia Lode to Thomas Bell, and his conveyance of the property to the Company. It also sets forth the original location of the lode by four of the original plaintiffs, on the 21st of June, 1876, and their actual possession thereof afterwards; and that they and the others of the original plaintiffs, who had become interested with them, made, on the 15th of March, 1877, an additional and supplementary claim and location of the Caledonia Lode, and, on the same day caused a certificate or notice of the original claim and location, as well as of the additional and supplementary claim and location, to be recorded in the mining records of the district.

The amended complaint further alleges that, from its original location in June, 1876, the plaintiff or its grantors have been in the actual and continuous possession of the Caledonia claim, and every part of it, and in accordance with the laws of the United States and of the Territory of Dakota, and the local rules and regulations of miners in the district; and have expended, in labor and money, more than $5,000 in its development and improvement; that the defendant Noonan claims an interest in a portion of its mining ground, to the extent of three acres and forty seven hundreths of an acre, by virtue of an alleged location of a quartz mining claim, called the Bobtail Lode, made by his predecessors in interest, in February, 1876, which is invalid and a cloud upon its title to the Caledonia Lode. It prays that the defendant may answer and set out particularly his claim to that portion of the Caledonia Lode which conflicts with the Bobtail Lode, and the nature of it; and that it may be adjudged that he has no estate or interest therein, and that he be enjoined from asserting any right or title to it.

The defendant, in his answer, denies the allegations of the complaint, except as they are afterwards admitted; and, specifically, any knowledge of the incorporation of the plaintiff, or of its compliance with the laws of Dakota in regard to foreign corporations; admits his claim to be the owner of the Bobtail Lode, his application for a patent, and the adverse action of the former plaintiffs; and sets up the discovery and location of that lode on the 24th of February, 1876, by parties through whom he derives his interest.

A replication traverses some of the matters set up in the answer, and asserts an abandonment and forfeiture of the interests of the original locators of the Bobtail Lode.

The action was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, by consent of parties. During the trial it appeared that one Thomas F. Mahan asserted an interest in the Bobtail Lode, and that he was a proper, if not a necessary, party to a complete determination of the matters in controversy. Thereupon, by consent of parties, he was made a codefendant in the action. The following is the entry made, at the time, in the journal of proceedings, following the title of the cause:

"Now, on this 15th day of July, A. D. 1880, the trial of the cause is resumed. By consent of all parties, Thomas F. Mahan is made a party defendant in this action. Counsel for defendant appear and answer instanter for him, any amendments to pleadings required to be prepared and served during the pendency of this action, or at its conclusion."

It appears that subsequently the two defendants joined in all proceedings taken. Before the entry of judgment, the plaintiff's attorneys, in order to make the record complete as to the new defendant, Mahan, instead of inserting his name at the proper place in the complaint, or rewriting it entirely, served upon the defendants' attorneys, and filed with the judgment roll, the following amendment:

"In the District Court, First Judicial District, Lawrence County, Dakota Territory.

"Caledonia Gold Mining Company (formerly Henry Lackey et al.), Plaintiff,
v.
"John Noonan and Thomas F. Mahan, Defendants.

"Now comes the above named plaintiff, and in pursuance and by authority of the court hereinbefore made, on the 15th day of July, 1880, making the said Thomas F. Mahan a defendant in this action, amends its amended and substitute complaint, which was herein filed November 6, 1879, by inserting therein the name of the said Thomas F. Mahan as a defendant, and by inserting in and adding to said complaint, immediately after the subdivision thereof numbered 9, and before the prayer thereof, the following allegation, to wit:

"10. And plaintiff further avers that the defendant, Thomas F. Mahan, has, or claims to have, some right, title, or interest adverse to plaintiff in or to that portion of the said Caledonia Lode claim above described by survey; that said claim of said defendant Mahan is without foundation or right as against plaintiff, but said Mahan persists in the same and makes said claim, as plaintiff is informed and believes, under the said alleged and pretended location of the said alleged Bobtail Lode claim above described as co-owner with, and claiming under the same right as, defendant Noonan, as above mentioned, and that said claim of said Mahan casts a cloud upon plaintiff's title to its said portion of said Caledonia Lode above described; and plaintiff, therefore, makes said Mahan a defendant in this action, and asks the same judgment, decree, and relief against him as hereinafter prayed against said defendant Noonan.

"CLAGETT & DIXON, Att'ys for Pl'ff."

No objection was taken in the district court to this mode of amending the pleadings. It was made the subject of comment for the first time in the Supreme Court of the Territory when the case was there on appeal, when it was contended that the amendment was irregular and insufficient, and left the original complaint without any allegations against the defendant Mahan, against whom, with the original defendant, the judgment was entered; and, therefore, that the judgment could not be sustained by the pleadings. That court held the objection to be untenable; and its ruling in this respect is assigned as error.

On the trial, the plaintiff, to establish its corporate existence, gave in evidence a copy of its articles of incorporation, certified by the clerk of the City and County of San Francisco, the place of its principal business, under his official seal, to be a correct copy of the original on file in his office; to which there was also appended a certificate of the Secretary of State of California, under the seal of the State, that it was also a correct copy of those on file in his office. By the law of California, the articles upon which a certificate of incorporation is issued are required to be filed with the clerk of the county in which the principal business of the corporation is to be conducted, and a certified copy with the Secretary of State. Civil Code, sec. 296. The plaintiff at the same time produced a copy of the articles on file in the office of the Secretary of the Territory, certified by him to be a correct copy, with the seal of the Territory annexed. To the introduction of these certified copies it was objected, generally, that they were "incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial," without any specification of the particular ground on which they were thus objectionable.

In the Supreme Court of the Territory, on appeal, it was objected that the documents were not properly authenticated as required by the Act of Congress, and that the certificates were signed by deputy officers; but that court held that the specific objection being one which, if taken below, might have been obviated there, it could not be urged on appeal under the general objection taken; and, therefore, ruled the point untenable. This ruling is also assigned as error.

Numerous other objections were taken by the plaintiffs, during the progress of the trial, to the introduction of evidence of acts of the predecessors of the plaintiff in locating and developing the Caledonia Lode, previous to February 28, 1877, when the right of the Indians to the Territory was extinguished by agreement with the United States. These and objections to the findings of the court on matters of fact constitute, in addition to those mentioned, the burden of the appellant's complaint. The court found for the plaintiff, and rendered judgment that it was the owner and entitled to the possession of the ground in controversy. On appeal to the Supreme Court of the Territory, the judgment was affirmed, and the defendants have brought the case to this court.

Messrs. Daniel McLaughlin and William R. Steele, for appellants.

Messrs. T. L. Skinner and S. S. Burdett, for respondent.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court, as follows:

The exceptions taken in the district court were fully considered and answered by the Supreme Court of the Territory in a clear and satisfactory opinion. The objections to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings of fact cannot be heard here; they were matters for consideration only in the courts below. Of the numerous assignments of error presented to us, we deem only three of sufficient importance to require special consideration. They are:

1. That the judgment is not sustained by the pleadings;

2. That the articles of incorporation of the plaintiff were admitted in evidence without due authentication; and,

3. That evidence of acts of the predecessors of the plaintiff in locating and developing the Caledonia Lode prior to the relinquishment of the Indian title to the United States was improperly admitted.

1. There would be some force in the objection that the judgment is not sustained by the pleadings, if the amendment joining Mahan as a codefendant with Noonan could not be read as a part of them. The judgment is against him as well as against Noonan, and there must appear somewhere in the record allegations by which it can be supported. It would have been the better course, when the order was entered that Mahan be joined as a codefendant, for the attorneys of the plaintiff to have had his name at once inserted in the complaint, with such other changes as to make the allegations apply to him. That such changes might have been made by consent of parties, without the formality of suspending the trial, and filing a new complaint, and waiting for an answer to it, there can be no doubt; and when thus made, the parties would be estopped from any subsequent objection to them. A provision of the Code of Civil Procedure of Dakota vests ample authority in the court to make changes of this character in furtherance of justice. Its language is: "The court may, before or after judgment, in furtherance of justice, and on such terms as may be proper, amend any pleadings, process or proceeding, by adding or striking out the name of any party; or by correcting a mistake in the name of a party, or a mistake in any other respect, or by inserting other allegations material to the case, or, if the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense, by conforming the proceeding or pleading to the facts proved." Sec. 142.

The trial continued after the amendment, the defendant Mahan participating in all its proceedings as if his name had been inserted in the complaint in the most formal manner, and he had answered it specifically. The agreement provided that the amendment might be made during the pendency of the action, or on its conclusion; and in accordance with it the amendment to the complaint filed with the judgment roll may properly be read and treated as part of the pleadings. If the defendant Mahan had desired to file a formal answer to the allegations of the complaint, he should have insisted upon it at the time. He was probably satisfied with the answer of his codefendant on file, which put in issue the plaintiff's title and set up all that he could have pleaded for himself. He had on the trial all the benefits of the most formal answer, and his connection with the case as a party sufficiently appears from the amendment filed.

2. The objection to the introduction of the articles of incorporation at the trial was that they were "immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent" evidence. The specific objection now urged, that they were not sufficiently authenticated to be admitted in evidence, and that the certificates were made by deputy officers, is one which the general objection does not include. Had it been taken at the trial and deemed tenable, it might have been obviated by other proof of the corporate existence of the plaintiff or by new certificates to the articles of incorporation. The rule is universal, that where an objection is so general as not to indicate the specific grounds upon which it is made, it is unavailing on appeal, unless it be of such a character that it could not have been obviated at the trial. The authorities on this point are all one way. Objections to the admission of evidence must be of such a specific character as to indicate distinctly the grounds upon which the party relies, so as to give the other side full opportunity to obviate them at the time, if under any circumstances that can be done. U. S. v. McMasters, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 680 [18: 811]; Burton v. Driggs, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 125 [22: 299]; Wood v. Weimar, 104 U. S. 795 [26: 781].

3. The objection urged to the admission of evidence of acts done by the grantors of the plaintiff in locating and developing the Caledonia mine previous to February 28, 1877, is founded upon the Treaty between the United States and the Sioux Indians, concluded on the 29th of April 1868, and ratified on the 16th of February, 1869. By the second article, a district of country embracing the region known as the Black Hills of Dakota, and which includes the mining property in controversy, was set apart as a reservation for the absolute and undisturbed use and occupation of those Indians, and such other friendly tribes or individual Indians to whose admission, from time to time, they and the United States might consent. And the United States stipulated that no person, except those designated and authorized by the Treaty, and such officers, agents, and employés of the government as might be authorized to enter upon Indian Reservations in the discharge of duties enjoined by law, should ever be permitted "to pass over, settle upon, or reside in the territory" described, or in such territory as might be added to the reservation. 15 Stat. at L. 635.

In a subsequent agreement with the Indians, ratified by Act of Congress on the 28th of February, 1877, the northern and western boundaries of the reservation were changed, leaving out the country of the Black Hills, which was relinquished by the Indians to the United States. That region was thus freed from the prohibition against settlement upon it, and opened like other public lands of the United States to exploration and occupation under the mining laws. It is contended that the Treaty operated as an actual prohibition against all acts taken by the predecessors of the plaintiff in the location and development of their mine, until the supplemental agreement of 1877, and that no support to their title can be derived from such acts, and therefore that no evidence of them was admissible.

Notwithstanding the prohibition of the Treaty, as soon as it became known, early in 1874, that the precious metals existed in the Black Hills, large numbers of persons entered upon the reservation and proceeded to appropriate mining ground, and to work and develop the mines. The subject soon attracted the attention of the public authorities, and an exploring expedition, to ascertain and report as to the mining and agricultural resources of the country, was organized and sent out by the Secretary of the Interior in 1875. The report of the geologist accompanying the expedition, made in November of that year, confirmed the existence of the precious metals on the reservation. In the meantime, as early as June, 1875, the Secretary, under direction of the President, appointed a commission to visit the Sioux Nation, with a view to secure to the citizens of the United States the right to mine in the country known as the Black Hills. Report of Commissioner of Indian Affairs for 1875, pp. 184, 185. The commission was unsuccessful, but the government was determined, notwithstanding, to open the mineral lands to development; and by the Act of August 15, 1876, 19 Stat. at L. 176, making appropriations for the Indian service, it was provided that thereafter there should be no appropriation made for the subsistence of the Indians unless they should first agree to relinquish all right and claim to so much of their permanent reservation as lay west of the 103d meridian of longitude. This was the Black Hills country. Negotiations were resumed, and a supplementary agreement was concluded, which was approved February 28, 1877, relinquishing that portion of the reservation, and ceding it to the United States. 19 Stat. at L. 254.

While it is true that, before the new agreement, the prohibition against settlement upon the country constituting the reservation of the Indians remained in full force, yet it was evident to all that it would soon be withdrawn by some arrangement; that immediately afterwards the mineral lands would be open to occupation and development; and that from that time mining claims taken up in the Territory would be respected and protected. With the new agreement the results anticipated followed. The presence of the miners on the reservation up to that time was illegal, but from that time it was legal. Those then in possession of mining claims, which had been taken up and developed in accordance with the rules of miners in mining districts of the country, were entitled to protection in their possessory claims as against the intrusion of others. The effect of the withdrawal of the district from the reservation, and the consequent end of the prohibition, was to leave the predecessors of the plaintiff exempt from liability to be disturbed for their unlawful entry on the land, and free to take measures under the mining laws for the perfection of their claims. Evidence of what had been done by them, the location of their claim, its extent, the amount of work done in its development, was competent, not as creating any absolute right to the property, but as showing the existence and condition of the property when their possession became lawful under the new agreement. Whether they should be protected in holding the property afterwards, depended upon their future compliance with the laws, statutory and mining, governing the possession and use of mineral lands in Dakota. The rule laid down by the Supreme Court of the Territory is, in our judgment, the correct one, which should govern cases of this kind, and that is substantially this: that where a party was in possession of a mining claim on the 28th of February, 1877, with the requisite discovery, with the surface boundaries sufficiently marked, with the notice of location posted, and with a disclosed vein of ore, he could, by adopting what had been done, causing a proper record to be made, and performing the amount of labor or making the improvements necessary to hold the claim, date his rights from that day; and that such location and labor and improvements would give him the right of possession. By this rule substantial justice is done to all parties who were entitled to protection in their mining claims when the new agreement took effect.

Such proceedings were taken in this case by the owners of the Caledonia mine. They renewed their location and claim, making a record of their original claim and location and of the supplementary one, in the proper mining records of the district.

The case appears to have been examined with great care in the Supreme Court of the Territory, and every consideration given to the positions of the appellants; and in its rulings we see no error.

Judgment affirmed.

HARRIS EAMES, Appt., [40]
v.
WILLIAM D. ANDREWS, ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 40-70.)

"Driven-well patent"—validity of—process—not necessary to set out scientific theory or principle—reissue, not void for want of novelty nor for describing different invention—infringement—when reissue is within statute—evidence—foreign publications.

1. Letters patent No. 73425 and reissued letters patent No. 4372 cover a process, the element of novelty in which consists in the driving of a tube tightly into the earth, without removing the earth upwards, to serve as a well pit, and attaching thereto a pump, thereby putting into practical use the new principle of forcing the water in the water bearing strata of the earth into a well pit, by the use of artificial power to create a vacuum.

4. The fact that the scientific theory or principle, the application of which is supposed to constitute the invention secured by said letters patent, is not set out in either the original patent or the reissue is immaterial.

3. The reissue is not void for describing a different invention in stating that the tube is "made air tight throughout its length," and that the patentee attaches "to the tube by an air tight connection any known form of pump." An air tight connection being indispensable to the operation of a pump, it was implied in the original specification. It is also fairly to be implied, from the entire language of the original specification, that the tube was intended to be air tight throughout its length.

4. There is nothing in these additions and amendments which either was not virtually contained by reasonable implication in the original description, or, if new, amounted to more than specific and exact directions to supplement those contained in the original.

5. With reference to the penetration of rock in constructing a well, the true meaning of the original patent is that the process of driving cannot be used to overcome the obstacle presented by the rock, but that otherwise the tube may be driven until it reaches the proper supply of water, and then operate as a driven well. The only effect of the amendments contained in the new specification and claim is to make that intention clear; and in legal effect the original and reissued patents are the same.

6. This court holds, upon a review of the evidence presented, that the reissued patent is not void for want of novelty.

7. The evidence presents a clear case of infringement, the patent not having been successfully evaded by boring until the water bearing stratum was reached.

8. Where the amended specification does not enlarge the scope of the patent by extending the claim so as to cover more than was embraced in the original, and thus cause the patent to include an invention not within the original, the rights of the public are not thereby narrowed, and the case is within the remedy intended by the statute.

9. Patented inventions cannot be superseded by the mere introduction of a foreign publication of the kind, though of prior date, unless the description and drawings contain and exhibit a substantial representation of the patented improvement, in such full, clear and exact terms as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to which it appertains to make, construct and practice the invention to the same practical extent as they would be enabled to do if the information was derived from a prior patent.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut. Opinion below, 15 Fed. Rep. 109. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case fully appear in the opinion of the court.

Compare the following case of Beedle v. Bennet, post, 1074.

1] Mr. C. R. Ingersoll, for appellant.

Messrs. A. Q. Keasbey and J. C. Clayton, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut upon a bill in equity filed by the appellees to restrain the alleged infringement of reissued letters patent No. 4872, issued to Nelson W. Green, on May 9, 1871, for an improved method of constructing artesian wells. The original letters patent, No. 73425, were issued to the patentee January 14, 1868. The defenses relied on were that the defendants did not infringe; that the patent was void for want of novelty in the invention; and that the reissued patent was void because it was not for the same invention as that described and claimed in the original patent. The controversy relates to what is commonly known as the "driven-well patent."

As one of the defenses is that the reissued patent is void, as covering more than was described and claimed in the original patent, it becomes necessary to compare the two, and for that purpose they are here printed in parallel columns, the drawings being the same in both:

Specification forming part of Letters Patent No. 73425, dated January 14, 1868.

ORIGINAL.

By it known that I, Nelson W. Green, of Cortland, in the County of Cortland, and State of New York, have invented a new and useful improvement in the manner of sinking and constructing artesian or driven wells where no 2] rock is to be penetrated, and of raising water therefrom; and I do hereby declare the following to be a full, clear and exact description of the same, reference being had to the accompanying drawings, mak-

Specification forming part of Letters Patent No. 73425, dated January 14, 1868; Reissue No. 4872, dated May 9, 1871.

REISSUE.

Be it known that I, Nelson W. Green, of Amherst, in the County of Hampshire, and State of Massachusetts, have invented a new and improved method of constructing artesian wells; and I do hereby declare that the following is a full, clear and exact description of the same, reference being had to the accompanying drawings, forming part of this specification.

My invention is particularly intended for ing a part of this specification, in which—

Fig. 1 represents a portion of the rod which is driven or forced into the ground to form the opening or hole for the insertion of the tube that forms the casing or lining of the well and the avenue through which the water is raised to or above the surface of the ground, and Fig. 2 represents a portion of the tube.

My invention consists in driving or forcing an iron or a wooden rod with a steel or iron point into the earth until it is projected to or into the water, and then withdrawing the said rod and inserting in its place a tube of metal or wood to the same depth, through which and from which the water may be drawn by any of the usual well known forms of pumps.

the construction of artesian wells in places [43] where no rock is to be penetrated.

The methods of constructing wells previous to this invention were what have been known as "sinking" and "boring," in both of which the hole or opening constituting the well was produced by taking away a portion of the earth or rock through which it was made.

This invention consists in producing the well by driving or forcing down an instrument into the ground until it reaches the water, the hole or opening being thus made by a mere displacement of the earth, which is packed around the instrument and not removed upward from the hole, as it is in boring.

Fig. 2.

The instrument to be employed in producing such a well, which to distinguish it from "sunk" or "bored" wells may be termed a "driven" well, may be any that is capable of sustaining the blows or pressure necessary to drive it into the earth; but I prefer to employ a pointed rod, [44] which, after having been driven or forced down until it reaches the water, I withdraw and replace by a tube made air tight throughout its length, except at or near its lower end, where I make openings or perforations for the admission of water, and through and from which the water may be drawn by any well known or suitable form of pump.

In certain soils the use of a rod preparatory to the insertion of a tube is unnecessary, as the tube itself through which the water is to be drawn, may be the instrument which produces the well, by the act of driving it into the ground to the requisite depth.

To enable others skilled in the art to make and use my invention, I will proceed to describe the same with reference to the drawings.

To enable others to make and use my invention, I will proceed to describe it with reference to the drawings in which—

The driving rod A I construct of wood or iron, or other metal, or of parts of each, with a sharp point, b, of steel, or otherwise, to penetrate the earth, and a slight swell, a, a short distance above the point, to make the hole slightly larger than the general diameter of the rod. This rod I drive, by a falling weight or other power, into the earth until its point passes sufficiently far into the water to procure the desired supply. I then withdraw the rod and insert in its place the iron or wooden tube B, which may be slightly contracted at its lower end to insure its easy passage to its place. In general, this tube B I make of iron, and of a thickness that will bear a force applied at its upper extremity sufficient to drive or force it to its place; and where a large or continuous flow of water is desired, I perforate this lower end of the tube to admit the water more freely to the inside.

The perforations c may be about one half of an inch in diameter, less or more, and from one to one and a half inches apart; and the perforations may extend from the bottom of the tube upward, from one to two feet. The diameter of the tube should be somewhat smaller than the diameter of the swell a on the drill end of the driving rod A.

In localities where the water is near the surface of the ground, and the well is for temporary use only, as in the case of a moving army, or for temporary camps, lighter and thinner material than iron may be used for making the tubes—as for instance, zinc, tin, copper, or sheet metal of other kind, or even wood may be used. The rod may be of any suitable and practical size that can be readily driven or forced into the ground, and may be from one to three inches in diameter.

Any suitable, well known pump may be applied to raise the water up through the tube to the surface or above it.

I am aware of James Suggett's patent of March 20, 1864, and I disclaim all secured to him therein.

Having thus fully described my invention, what I claim and desire to secure by letters patent is—

The herein described process of sinking wells where no rock is to be penetrated, viz.: by driving or forcing down a rod to and into the water under ground and withdrawing it and inserting a tube in its place to draw the water through, substantially as herein described.

What I claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, is—

The process of constructing wells by driving or forcing an instrument into the ground until it is projected into the water without removing the earth upward, as it is in boring, substantially as herein described.

The attempts judicially to enforce the rights claimed under this patent have met with determined resistance, and given rise to extensive litigation, in the course of which the original and reissued patents have been subjected to great scrutiny and criticism. The first reported case is that of Andrews v. Carman, 13 Blatchf. 307, decided by Judge Benedict in 1876. That has been followed by Andrews v. Wright, before Judges Dillon and Nelson, 13 Off. Gaz. 969; Hine v. Wahl, before Judge Grosham; Andrews v. Oroes, before Mr. Justice Blatchford, then circuit judge, 19 Blatchf. 294; Green v. French, before Judge Nixon, 11 Fed. Rep. 591; Andrews v. Creegan, before Judge Wheeler, 19 Blatchf. 113; Andrews v. Long, before Judge McCrary, 2 McCrary, 577; the present case before Judge Shipman, 15 Fed. Rep. 109; and Andrews v. Cone, and Andrews v. Hovey heard before Judges Love, Shiras, and Nelson, 5 McCrary, 181. The case of Hine v. Wahl was argued in this court on appeal at October Term, 1882, the decree below being affirmed by a divided court. The patent has been sustained against all defenses made in the cases just mentioned, except in those of Andrews v. Cone, and Andrews v. Hovey, 5 McCrary, 181, which are now pending on appeal in this court.

The extent of this litigation attests at least the utility of the process supposed to be described in the patent, as it shows and measures the extent of the public demand for its use. This is further shown by the statement of one of the complainants in the present cause when examined as a witness, who says that large numbers of wells constructed according to the process described in the patent are in use in the New England States, New York, Pennsylvania, and most of the Western States, as well as in New Jersey, and probably in every State in the Union; and that from estimates made by agents, well drivers, and others having an opportunity of knowledge in the matter, it is believed that the number of driven wells throughout the United States is somewhere between five hundred thousand and a million.

The wells in general use prior to the date of this patent were of two kinds: 1, the open, common, dug well, usually walled or boarded or otherwise lined, from which the water which collected in the well was usually lifted by means of a bucket and windlass, or by a pump; and 2, artesian wells, bored frequently to a great depth by means of drills, chisels, augers, and other such tools, whereby the opening was made into the earth to the water supply. In both kinds the process used was to make an excavation, removing the material through the opening. It was usual in making artesian bored wells to drive down a wooden or iron pipe, open at both ends, having a sharp edge around the circumference of its lower extremity, the earth being taken out from within it. As the driving proceeds, and after it reaches the rock, chisels, drills, and other tools are used to disintegrate the rock, which is taken to the surface through the tube so driven. In the latter case, the tube is inserted into the hole bored for the purpose of preventing the caving in of the sides of the opening. Through that tube the water is drawn, if necessary, by a pump, or otherwise flows in consequence of pressure from the head.

The manner in which the water is obtained and supplied, by means of these two descriptions of wells, is thus stated, as we suppose correctly, by an expert witness in this case. He says:

"Water is supplied to open dug wells only by the force of gravity, and when the water is pumped from them by the ordinary suction pump, the pressure of the atmosphere is the same on the surface of the water in the well as it is upon the water in the earth surrounding it; and the result is that the water in the well [49] itself, being in free space, is more readily forced by the pressure of the atmosphere into the suction pipe of the pump than the surrounding water, which is retarded by friction through the earth; and in consequence the continued operation of the pump soon exhausts the water in the well, which supply can only be replenished by the action of gravity, the pressure of the atmosphere to retard its flow into the well being equal to and counterbalancing the pressure exerted by the atmosphere upon the surface of the water in the earth; and the operation of the pump has no effect upon the water in the surrounding earth to force it into the well; hence, the supply to the open dug well is due to and produced only by the action of gravity.

"In the artesian well the same principles govern in regard to the means of supply, when they are not flowing wells, but in consequence of such wells being usually inserted down into rock or like substance until they meet with open fissures in the rock, through which water flows more freely and readily than it does through ordinary compacted earth, sand, etc., which form the water bearing strata above the rock, a much larger quantity of water is obtained therefrom in proportion to their diameter than is usually obtained from the dug well, unless, as in some cases, the dug wells are carried down into a rock stratum and strike a similar seam in the rock. When artesian wells are flowing wells, the generally received opinion is that their supply of water comes from a water bearing stratum lying beneath a stratum practically impervious to water, but which lower stratum extends beyond and crops out at the surface of the earth at a greater or less distance from the well itself (often many miles away), and at a considerably higher elevation than the surface of the earth at the well."

The same witness describes the invention, which he supposes to be embodied in the driven well and covered by the patent in suit, as follows:

"I understand the invention to be founded upon the discovery by Col. Green, that if a pipe which is air tight throughout its length, except at its upper end and at or near its lower end, where are openings for the admission of water, be inserted into the earth, down and into a water bearing stratum, the pipe within the [50] water bearing stratum being surrounded and in close contact with the earth, and having a pump of any ordinary construction attached by an air tight connection to its upper end, thus forming a well, air tight from its upper end, into and below the surface of the water in the earth, that upon operating the pump so attached and removing the pressure of the atmosphere from the well, the pressure of the atmosphere through the earth upon the surface of the water within the earth would force the water into the body of the well with a velocity due to the pressure of the atmosphere, and that the supply of the water to the well directly from the earth surrounding it would be continuous and lasting, so long as water was contained in the stratum of earth with which the lower end of the pipe was in communication, and that the water contained in that stratum could be made directly tributary to the well without regard to the distance to which said water bearing stratum might extend. In other words, that unlike the previously known open wells, either dug or bored, into which the water from the surrounding earth was forced by the action of gravity alone, he could control the delivery of water to a well by this pressure of the atmosphere, which he discovered acted as effectually, through the earth, to force water from the earth into a well from which the pressure of the atmosphere had been removed, as if no earth existed above the surface of the water.

"To utilize this discovery he proposed a method of making a well by simply driving a tube down through the earth into a water bearing stratum, by which means he secured a close contact of the lower end of his tube with the earth of the water bearing stratum."

The differences between the wells previously in common use and the driven wells are stated by the same witness as follows:

"The distinguishing characteristics of a driven well, as it differs from the dug well, is that when the pressure is relieved from the interior of the tube which itself forms the body of the well, not only does the force of gravity act to supply it with water directly from the [51] earth, but there being no intervening body of water between the wall of the well itself and the earth surrounding it, upon which the atmosphere can act directly and with greater effect to force it into the well (as it can and does in the open well), the water is supplied directly to it from the earth surrounding it in a direct inverse ratio to its distance from the well, and the friction of the water through the earth being directly as the square of its velocity, as the distance from the well increases the water moves very much slower than it does immediately next to the well itself; but the area of the source of supply being increased exactly in the ratio of the square of its distance from the well, and the friction being increased exactly as the square of the velocity (in any given stratum), the one exactly counterbalancing the other, it follows that, from natural laws, the surface of the water in the earth surrounding the well is and must be maintained practically at a given level; whereas, in the open well, supplied by gravity only, the water in the earth inclines from the natural surface of the stratum in the earth to the bottom of the well, the angle of that decline decreasing as the supply is taken from the well, and, unless pumping is stopped and time allowed for a resupply, the lowering of the water in the earth extends to a continually increasing distance and a longer time is required to obtain the original quantity in the well, while the supply to the driven well is continuous and steady and practically inexhaustible, the supply in a given time being proportioned in any given soil to the size of the pipe forming the well, having openings proportionate to its size, different wells varying in the supply according to the nature of the soil in which they are inserted, but remaining virtually constant at all times in the same soil. It is not claimed, nor is it a fact, that water can be pumped from a driven well, in any given stratum, with greater ease than from an open well sunk into the same stratum; but the great advantages are that a much larger and more extended supply of water is controlled, and, in consequence of the passage of the water through the earth, under the pressure of the atmosphere, a constant filtration is secured, thus securing both a greater supply and better [52] water. And where large and continuous supplies are obtained by unintermitted pumping, for days and weeks at a time, experience has shown that the quantity of water has gradually but perceptibly improved, as in the case of the wells at Bellville, heretofore mentioned, where an amount of water is emptied largely exceeding the rainfall upon the entire territory not shut out from the valley by outcropping rocks on three sides and open to salt water upon the fourth, and no practical diminution of the height of the water is observed.

"One peculiar characteristic of a driven well, as distinguished from the bored artesian well, is that the driven well is for use in soil where no rock is to be penetrated, and where the pressure of the atmosphere is free to act upon the surface of the water in the earth surrounding it; while the artesian well is usually, if not always, bored into a rock stratum, and is supplied with water through fissures in the rock instead of through the earth itself surrounding the entrance or opening to the well."

In describing the mode of constructing a driven well under the patent, the same witness states that the pipes in general use, which are driven into the ground, have openings for the admission of water into them near the lower end, usually extending up around the sides of the pipe from fifteen inches, sometimes up to several feet. These holes are about three eighths of an inch square, over which upon raised rings is placed a screen of perforated brass, having openings of a size giving from one hundred and fifty to three hundred to the square inch. When the pump is first applied to such a pipe, a small amount of mud or sand is at first usually brought up, coming from a greater or less distance from the outside of the tube, but not leaving an open space around the perforations, as these are not large enough to admit of but the smaller particles near the tube. It leaves interstices between the coarser particles in it, and through which the water flows, and which are constantly filled with water. The swell on the point of a driven well tube, shown in the drawing and marked a, is made larger in diameter than the tube itself, or the coupling to the tube, for the reason, as stated, that there is a certain elasticity in the soil, which, after driving a certain sized instrument into it, causes [53] the hole to contract after the point passes; and it was thus found necessary to make the point somewhat larger than even the couplings of the pipe, for the purpose of partially relieving the pipe and couplings from the great friction resulting from their passage through the hole thus contracted. After reaching a water bearing stratum of the earth, the earth at once settles around the point and tube, even more rapidly and effectually than it does above the water stratum, and the hole made by driving an instrument into a water bearing stratum and withdrawing it will remain intact but a very short time, unless that stratum is composed of gravel and similar substances, thus leaving the entrance to the pipe in close contact with the earth and effectually protecting the entrance from the admission of air or free water standing between the pipe and the earth surrounding it. The effect, therefore, of this feature of the tube is more effectually to make air tight the point or lower part of the tube.

The scientific theory stated by the expert witness on behalf of the complainants, as an explanation of the principle according to which the patented process operates in furnishing a supply of water by means of a driven well, is not contradicted or qualified by any opposing testimony, and, so far as we can know, is not inconsistent with accepted scientific knowledge. The general introduction and use of driven wells since the date of the patent, both in in this country and abroad, strongly corroborates the supposition that their construction and operation is based upon the application of some natural force not previously known or used. It appears from the evidence in this cause that the process of making driven wells was subjected to experimental tests by the best authorities in England, and found so successful that it was used to great advantage in the supply of water to British troops in the Abyssinian expedition under General Napier, in 1867.

In view of these premises, Judge Benedict, in Andrews v. Carman, 13 Blatchf. 307, construed the patent in suit according to the following extracts from his opinion in that case:

"The difference between the new process under consideration and the old is that the pressure of the atmosphere, which, in the ordinary [54] well, operates at the sides and bottom of the well pit to maintain an equally distributed atmospheric pressure upon the water, whereby the flow of water into the well is made dependent upon the force of gravity, in the new process is removed from within the well pit, and ceases there to operate against the inward flow of water, so that the pressure of the atmosphere operates with its full power to force the water in the earth from the earth into the well pit, and without any opposition caused by meeting, in its flow, the pressure of the atmosphere at the sides or bottom of the pit. This process involves a new idea, which was put to practical use when the method was devised of fitting tightly in the earth, by the act of driving without removing the earth upwards, a tube, open at both ends, but otherwise air tight, and extending down to a water bearing stratum, to which is attached a pump, a vacuum in the well pit, and at the same time in the water bearing stratum of the earth, being necessarily created by the operation of a pump attached to a pipe so driven."

* * * * *

"The novelty of the process under consideration does not lie in a mechanical device for sinking the shaft or raising the water to the surface, but in the method whereby water, by the use of artificial power, is made to move with increased rapidity from the earth into the shaft, whence it results that a tube but a few inches in diameter, driven down tightly to a water bearing stratum of the earth, affords an abundant supply of water to a pump attached thereto, and constitutes a practical and productive well. Such an invention is without the field of mechanical contrivance. It consists in the new application of a power of nature, by which new application a new and useful result is attained. There is no new product, but an old product—water—is obtained from the earth in a new and advantageous manner."

* * * * *

"In the specification we find stated more clearly the distinguishing feature of the process, wherein it differs from any process before adopted for procuring a supply of water from the earth; for the specification says that an in- [55] strument is to be driven into the ground until it reaches water, having the earth tightly packed around it. It is by means of this packing of the earth tightly around the tube that the force developed by the creating of the vacuum in the well pit is brought to bear directly upon the water lying in the water bearing stratum, to force it into the well pit; and this driven tube forms the well pit of the new invention, for, as stated, it is to be a tube made air tight throughout its length, except at its lower end, where are to be perforations for the admission of water, and through and from which the water may be drawn by a pump. The specification also mentions the vacuum, and points out where it is to be created, for a vacuum must of necessity be formed in the well pit and in the water bearing stratum, by operating a pump attached to such a tube, so driven into the earth."

* * * * *

"I therefore understand this patent to be a patent for a process, and that the element of novelty in this process consists in the driving of a tube tightly into the earth, without removing the earth upwards, to serve as a well pit, and attaching thereto a pump, which process puts to practical use the new principle of forcing the water in the water bearing strata of the earth from the earth into a well pit, by the use of artificial power applied to create a vacuum, in the manner described."

Assuming this construction of the patent to be correct, it is, however, now contended on behalf of the appellant that the reissue is void because the invention described in it is not contained in the original patent.

It is to be observed that the scientific theory and principle, the application of which is supposed to constitute the invention of Col. Green, are not set forth either in the original or reissued patents. This feature was commented upon by Mr. Justice Blatchford in Andrews v. Cross, 19 Blatchf. 294, 305, as follows: "It may be that the inventor did not know what the scientific principle was, or that, knowing it, he omitted, from accident or design, to set it forth. That does not vitiate the patent. He sets forth the process or mode of operation which ends in the result, and the means for working out the process or mode of operation. The principle referred to is only the why and the wherefore. That is not required to be set forth. Under section [56] 26 of the Act of July 8, 1870, 16 Stat. at L. 201, under which this reissue was granted, the specification contains a description of the invention and of 'the manner and process of making, constructing, compounding and using it,' in such terms as to enable any person skilled in the art to which it appertains to make, construct, compound, and use it; and, even regarding the case as one of a machine, the specification explains the principle of the machine, within the meaning of that section, although the scientific or physical principle on which the process acts when the pump is used with the air tight tube, is not explained. An inventor may be ignorant of the scientific principle, or he may think he knows it and yet be uncertain, or he may be confident as to what it is and others may think differently. All this is immaterial, if by the specification the thing to be done is so set forth that it can be reproduced."

The particulars relied on to establish the proposition that the reissued patent describes a different invention from that contained in the original are as follows: 1. It is said that it is essential to the success of the process that the end of the tube should form an air tight connection with the surrounding earth; that the tube itself should be air tight, and attached to a pump with an air tight connection; which elements are set out in the reissued patent, and are not contained in the original.

Upon this point, speaking of the original patent, Judge Shiras, in the Circuit Court for the Southern District of Iowa, in Andrews v. Hovey, 5 McCrary, 195, said: "He describes a driving rod, having a swell thereon, which is to be driven into the ground and then withdrawn, and a tube of a diameter somewhat smaller than the diameter of the swell of the drill rod is to be inserted in the hole thus made. In no part of the description is it said, either expressly or by fair implication, that the tube, when inserted, must fit so closely into the opening made by the rod that no air can pass down on the outside of the tube to the water; nor is it stated that the [57] pump must be attached by an air tight connection to the top of the tube. A person can follow with exactness all the instructions therein given, and yet it would not necessarily follow that he had excluded the air from the lining of the well, or from the water bearing stratum at the place where the tube penetrated the same. In other words, the description of the means to be employed, as set forth in these specifications, does not show that one of the results arrived at is to render the lining of the well air tight, and to have attached thereto a pump by an air tight connection. The description of the means to be employed can be carried out in practice without making an air tight lining or tube, and hence without forming a vacuum around the bottom of the tube or in it. This being true, it follows that it cannot, from the description of the means employed, be inferred that Col. Green then intended to claim, as part of his discovery or invention, the application of the principle that by creating a vacuum in and about the tube, the same having been made air tight, the flow of water would be largely increased. He did not claim it in express words, and the description of his invention, and the means to be used in carrying the same into practical use, fail to show that such was the main or even a necessary part of his invention."

To this view there are two sufficient answers:

1. We think it is a reasonable inference, from the language employed in the specification of the original patent, that the tube, in the act of being driven into the earth, to and into a water bearing stratum, would form an air tight connection with the surrounding earth, and that the pump should be attached by an air tight connection. This inference reasonably follows from the fact, shown in the evidence, that the mere act of driving the tube, as distinguished from boring, usually results in making an air tight connection with the surrounding earth. The necessary effect of driving the tube is to displace the earth laterally by compressing it; and the elasticity of the earth is such as to cause it to cling and contract around the tube so as to exclude the air, so that anyone following the directions in the specification of the original patent would in fact usually so drive [58] the tube as to make the necessary air tight connection, whether he consciously intended to do so or not. As the object of applying a pump to the upper orifice of the tube was to draw the water flowing into its lower end, it would equally follow, as a matter of common knowledge, both that the tube itself should be air tight, and that it should be attached to the pump with an air tight connection, because a vacuum in the tube is necessary to raise the water in all cases where it does not flow out in consequence of the superior height of its source, and the consequent pressure of the head.

The precise objection to the reissued specification is that it states that the tube which is to replace the driven rod is "made air tight throughout its length," and also that in cases where the aid of a pump to draw the water from the well may be necessary, the patentee attaches "to the tube by an air tight connection any known form of pump;" and that the original specification does not state that the tube is made air tight throughout its length, nor that the pump is to be attached to the tube by an air tight connection, but only states that "any suitable well known pump may be applied to raise the water up through the tube to the surface or above it."

It appears, however, in evidence, that the patentee, when applying for his reissue, with the text of the specification reading as it does now, applied to have granted to him a second claim in these words: "I also claim, in combination with a tube driven well, an attachment of a pump to the tube by an air tight connection substantially as herein set forth;" that the Patent Office rejected this second claim, assigning its reasons in these words: "The second clause is for a pump attached to a tube by an air tight connection. This is indispensable to the operation of a pump, and a universal right. Whenever a supply of water is found, a pump may be applied without new invention;" that, in a subsequent communication by the Patent Office to the patentee, the office, in speaking of this proposed second claim, said: "This device is of universal use in artesian well tubes and other connections, and is a necessity in the relation of pumps to well tubes;" and that the patentee afterwards withdrew the proposed second claim.

As the air tight connection was indispensable to the operation of a pump, it was implied of necessity in the original specification, as much so as if it had been expressed; and there was no [59] enlargement of the invention in stating the fact in the reissued specification.

In view of all this, it is also fairly to be implied, from the entire language of the original specification, that the tube was intended to be air tight throughout its length. As that specification states that the water is to be raised up through the tube to the surface by the pump, and as an air tight connection at the junction of the pump with the tube was "indispensable to the operation of the pump," so it was equally a necessity to the perfect operation of the apparatus that the tube should be air tight throughout its length, these facts being both of them common knowledge in the art.

2. But even if this were not so, the case would be simply that of a specification defective for not containing a full and perfect description of the process intended to be patented. It presents the very case of the right secured to a patentee by section 53 of the Act of July 8, 1870, which provides "That whenever any patent is inoperative or invalid by reason of a defective or insufficient specification, * * * if the error has arisen by inadvertence, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, the commissioner shall, on the surrender of such patent and the payment of the duty required by law, cause a new patent for the same invention, and in accordance with the corrected specification, to be issued to the patentee," etc.

If the amended specification does not enlarge the scope of the patent by extending the claim so as to cover more than was embraced in the original, and thus cause the patent to include an invention not within the original, the rights of the public are not thereby narrowed, and the case is within the remedy intended by the statute. Those cases in which this court has held reissues to be invalid were of a different character, and were cases where by the reissued patent the scope of the original was so enlarged as to cover and claim as a new invention that which was either not in the original specification, as a part of the invention described, or if [60] described, was, by not being claimed, virtually abandoned and dedicated to public use.

Such is not the present case. Here the amended specification does not enlarge the scope of the original invention as described in the original specification. It simply, in this respect, supplies a deficiency, by describing with more particularity and exactness the means to be employed to produce the desired result. It is thus said, in the specification of the reissued patent, that "This invention consists in producing the well by driving or forcing down an instrument into the ground until it reaches the water, the hole or opening being thus made by a mere displacement of the earth, which is packed around the instrument, and not removed upward from the hole as it is in boring;" and "I prefer to employ a pointed rod, which, after having been driven or forced down until it reaches the water, I withdraw, and replace by a tube made air tight throughout its length, except at or near its lower end, where I make openings or perforations for the admission of water, and through and from which the water may be drawn by any well known or suitable form of pump;" and "In certain soils the use of a rod preparatory to the insertion of a tube is unnecessary, as the tube itself, through which the water is to be drawn, may be the instrument which produces the well by the act of driving it into the ground to the requisite depth;" and "In some cases the water will flow out from the top of the tube without the aid of a pump. In other cases, the aid of a pump to draw the water from the well may be necessary. In the latter cases, I attach to the tube, by an air tight connection, any known form of pump."

There is nothing in these additions and amendments which either was not virtually contained by reasonable implication in the original description, or, if new, amounted to more than specific and exact directions to supplement those contained in the original. The invention is not differently described, and is not described so as to be a different invention, nor is the claim enlarged.

In the second place, however, under this head, a material alteration from the original, [61] in the amended specification, is said to have been made in the following respect: the original specification starts out with a declaration that the patentee has "invented a new and useful improvement in the manner of sinking and constructing artesian or driven wells, where no rock is to be penetrated, and of raising water therefrom;" and the claim is stated to be "the herein described process of sinking wells where no rock is to be penetrated," etc. In the specification of the reissued patent, he says: "My invention is particularly intended for the construction of artesian wells in places where no rock is to be penetrated;" and the claim is for "the process of constructing wells by driving or forcing an instrument into the ground until it is projected into the water, without removing the earth upward, as it is in boring, substantially as herein described;" from which, it will be observed, are omitted the words "where no rock is to be penetrated."

It is therefore contended that the effect of this amendment to the specification and claim is to enlarge the scope of the patent, so as to cover by the reissued patent the process of constructing driven wells, whether rock is to be penetrated or not, while the original patent was expressly limited to cases where no rock was to be penetrated. We do not, however, so understand either the reason or the effect of these amendments. It is perfectly evident, from the nature and description of the invention, that a driven well cannot be made where, through its whole course, the formation is rock, or where the supply of water to be utilized is found in the fissure of a rock formation. This is so for the reason that the tube cannot be driven through rock. Rock must be bored by drills, augers, chisels, and other similar instruments for perforating it and withdrawing the comminuted particles. So, where the supply of water which must be utilized consists of a flowing stream, or a pool, found in a rock formation, the point of the driven rod or tube cannot be inserted by driving, as described in the patent, so as to form the air tight connection necessary to the successful operation of the principle on which the process of the patent depends. Therefore, it follows from the amended specification and the claim of the reissued patent, by the necessity of the case, as expressly declared in the original, that a driven well cannot be constructed in a rock formation.

On the other hand, it does not follow, either [62] from the amended or the original patent, that a driven well, according to the process described, may not be constructed and operated, notwithstanding in its construction some rock has to be penetrated. There may be a layer of rock on the surface; when this is removed or cut through, a driven well may then be constructed in the space thus uncovered from the obstruction. So, if a stratum of rock is met in the course of driving the rod or tube, that layer may be penetrated, not by driving the rod or tube through it, but by other usual means of boring and drilling. After it is passed, the rod or tube having been inserted in the opening made through the rock may then be driven in the usual manner through the remainder of its course until it reaches a water bearing stratum of earth, as if no rock had been met in its passage.

The object and purpose of the amendments to the specification obviously were to meet a possible construction of the original whereby the patentee would be precluded from the use of his process where it was evidently intended to be applied, simply because one or more strata of rock had to be penetrated in the process of driving. Such, in our opinion, is not the meaning of the original patent. Its true meaning is that, so far as it may be necessary to penetrate a rock in the course of constructing a well, the process of driving cannot be used to overcome the obstacle presented by the rock, but that otherwise the tube may be driven until it reaches the proper supply of water, and then operate as a driven well. The only effect of the amendments contained in the new specification and claim is to make that intention clear.

So far as, in the course of constructing a well, rock must be penetrated, the driven-well process cannot be used in the perforation of the rock, but in every other part of its course it may be applied. Such, in our judgment, is the legal effect of both the original and the reissued patents.

In our opinion, therefore, the grounds on which it is sought to invalidate the reissued patent, as being for a different invention from that described in the original, cannot be sustained.

[63] This conclusion is not in conflict with anything said in Russell v. Dodge, 93 U. S. 460 [23:978]. Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, referring to the provisions of the statutes in reference to reissues, said: "According to these provisions a reissue could only be had where the original patent was inoperative or invalid, by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, or where the claim of the patentee exceeded his right, and then only in case the error committed had arisen from the causes stated. And as a reissue could only be granted for the same invention embraced by the original patent, the specification could not be substantially changed, either by the addition of new matter or the omission of important particulars, so as to enlarge the scope of the invention as originally claimed. A defective specification could be rendered more definite and certain so as to embrace the claim made, or the claim could be so modified as to correspond with the specification; but, except under special circumstances, such as occurred in the case of Morey v. Lockwood, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 230 [19:339], where the inventor was induced to limit his claim by the mistake of the Commissioner of Patents, this was the extent to which the operation of the original patent could be changed by the reissue. The object of the law was to enable patentees to remedy accidental mistakes, and the law was perverted when any other end was secured by the reissue." And this is in harmony with all that has since been said by this court on the subject of reissued patents.

It is further contended on the part of the appellant that the reissued patent in suit is void for want of novelty:

1. Under this head, it is first alleged that it is anticipated by a patent granted to James Suggett, March 29, 1864. In the specification of the original patent of Green, of January 14, 1868, he says: "I am aware of James Suggett's patent of March 29, 1864, and I disclaim all secured to him therein." The reissued patent omits that disclaimer. After the application for the reissued patent, as appears by the contents of the file wrapper, an interference was declared to which the parties were Byron Mudge, for a reissue of his patent for a mode [64] of constructing wells, and the above named patent of James Suggett, for putting down and operating bored wells, and the application of Col. Green. The matter was carried by appeal from the decision of the Commissioner of Patents to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. The judgment of that court was that Suggett was entitled to priority of invention in regard to what was claimed by him in his patent, and that Col. Green was also entitled to have a patent issue to him according to his amended specification. The decision of the judge of the Supreme Court of District of Columbia says: "I am clearly of opinion that Green first put into practice the conception of making a driven well, and is entitled, therefore, to his patent for the broad claim of sinking wells by driving down the pump or rod without removing the dirt upward, and that Suggett was entitled to a patent for the perforated pipe and point for sinking wells; and I therefore affirm the decision of the Commissioner." Suggett's patent, on the face of his specification, is for a "new and improved method of putting down and operating bored wells," and all that his claim covers is the apparatus consisting of the perforated pipe with a pointed end, constructed as a drill, and united with a pump. The subjects of the two patents are quite different, and do not necessarily conflict, even on the supposition that Suggett's patent is in force, although, as testified in this case, it as been judicially declared to be invalid for want of novelty.

2. An anticipation of the driven-well patent is also alleged by reason of an English patent granted to John Goode, August 20, 1823. That patent, however, like that of Suggett's, does not profess to be a patent for a process of raising water from the earth by means of wells of any particular construction or mode of operation, but merely for "certain tools of various formation for the purpose of boring the earth, and certain apparatus for the purpose of raising water," which the patentee says "constitute my certain improvements as aforesaid."

3. It is further contended that the driven-well patent is anticipated by having been previously described in numerous printed publications. Of these there were introduced in evidence in this cause by the appellant those enu- [65] merated in the following list:

1. An extract from volume 4, "Repertory of Patent Inventions," published in London in 1827, by T. & G. Underwood, page 113, which however, merely contains a detailed description of the machinery, tools and apparatus for boring the earth, described in John Goode's patent of August 20, 1823.

The rule governing defenses alleging the invalidity of the patent by reason of prior printed publications was stated by Mr. Justice Clifford in Seymour v. Osborne, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 516, 555 [20:33, 42] in this language: "Patented inventions cannot be superseded by the mere introduction of a foreign publication of the kind, though of prior date, unless the description and drawings contain and exhibit a substantial representation of the patented improvement, in such full, clear, and exact terms as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to which it appertains to make, construct, and practice the invention to the same practical extent as they would be enabled to do if the information was derived from a prior patent. Mere vague and general representations will not support such a defense, as the knowledge supposed to be derived from the publication must be sufficient to enable those skilled in the art or science to understand the nature and operation of the invention, and to carry it into practical use. Whatever may be the particular circumstances under which the publication takes place, the account published, to be of any effect to support such a defense, must be an account of a complete and operative invention, capable of being put into practical operation."

The same rule was repeated by Mr. Justice Strong in the opinion of the Court in Cohn v. U. S. Corset Co. 98 U. S. 366, 370 [23:907,908], as follows: "It must be admitted that, unless the earlier printed and published description does exhibit the later patented invention in such a full and intelligible manner as to enable persons skilled in the art to which the invention is related to comprehend it without assistance from the patent, or to make it, or repeat the process claimed, it is insufficient to invalidate the patent." This rule was affirmed in Downton v. Yeager Milling Co. 108 U. S. 466, 471 [27:789,791].

The application of this rule to the publications relied upon in the present case shows that none of them can properly be said to anticipate the invention of the driven well. It would [67] serve no useful purpose specially to notice in this opinion all the publications mentioned in the record; a few, as samples most relied on, will be considered.

The first is the extract from MacKenzie's 5,000 Receipts. It appears, from the file wrapper in the matter of the reissued letters patent in the suit, that the application was rejected at first by the examiner in the Patent Office on reference to this extract, which is as follows: "To raise water in all situations. The finest springs may be found by boring, which is performed in the simplest manner by the mere use of an iron rod forced into the earth by a windlass. The workmen in a few days get to a genuine spring of pure water, fit for every purpose. After the water is found they merely put the tin pipes down the aperture, and it preserves a fine stream which sometimes rises from four to five feet high." It is quite obvious that this has no relation whatever to the process of obtaining water by means of driven wells. It is nothing more than a simple process of finding water in the usual way, as in the case of an ordinary dug or bored well, such as have been immemorially used.

The same observation equally applies to the extract from Rees' Cylopædia, under the title of Well in Rural Economy, which is as follows: "The most ingenious of these is that proposed by a French philosopher, who has advised that the ground should be perforated to a sufficient depth by means of an auger or borer; a cylindrical wooden pipe being then placed in the hole and driven downward with a mallet, and the boring continued, that the pipe may be forced down to a greater depth, so as to reach the water or spring. In proportion as the borer becomes filled with earth it should be drawn up and cleared, when, by adding fresh portions of pipe, the boring may be carried to much extent under ground, so that water may in most cases be thus reached and obtained. It is stated that wells made in this manner are superior to those constructed in the common method, not only in point of cheapness, but also by affording a more certain and abundant supply of water, while no accident can possibly happen to the workmen employed. In case the water near the surface should not be of a good quality, the [68] perforation may be continued to a still greater depth, till a purer fluid can be procured; and when wells have become impure or tainted from any circumstance or accident, when previously emptied, and the bottom perforated in a similar manner, so as to reach the lower sheet of water, it will rise in the cylindrical tube in a pure state into the body of the pump fixed for the purpose of bringing it up."

The extract from "Brande's Encyclopædia," under the article Well, is as follows: "The use of the borer alone may procure an adequate supply of water in particular situations. This mode appears to have been long resorted to in this and other countries. From what we have already stated as to the disposition of strata, the conditions requisite for its success will be readily conceived; viz., watery strata connected with others on a higher level. The pressure of the water contained in the higher parts of such strata on that in the lower will readily force up the latter through any orifice, however small. All that is necessary, therefore, is to bore down to the stratum containing the water, and, having completed the bore, to insert a pipe into the bore, which may either be left to overflow into a cistern or it may terminate in a pump."

"BORING WELLS.

"LEEDS, March 15, 1824.

"Drive a cast iron pipe through the gravel —i. e., by means of a weight hung at the end of a spring pole, used in boring; and should the pipe meet with any loose stone to obstruct its passage, put the boring rods into the pipe, and bore until the stone is broken to pieces or driven sideways; then drive the pipe as before. I have had the management of a great many bore holes for water in this neighborhood, some above 100 yards deep, and many contrivances I have used on account of difficulties met with in different strata. I shall be happy to give your correspondent every information in my power on the subject, and, if agreeable to you, [69] will send a list of a few holes, stating the different strata gone through and the several springs of water met with.

"Yours, &c., T. T.

"N. B.—The shell borer must be used at times to bring out the gravel that gets into the pipe, and the pipe must have spigot and faucet joints."

There is nothing in these extracts to suggest the peculiarities which distinguish the driven well as described in the reissued patent; and it may be said, in general, of all the extracts contained in the record, including these, that so far as they undertake to describe anything in actual and practical use, they point merely to the ordinary, bored, artesian well, or the instruments and implements to be used in its construction.

This view of these publications is strongly corroborated by the circumstances attending the introduction of Green's process of driven wells into public use in England. It is shown that his agent for the introduction of the well into that country, and to whom the invention was sold, James L. Norton, took out in his own name an English patent, and, as has already been stated, and as is shown in the proof, after various experimental tests made by civil and military engineers of high authority, the driven well according to this process was adopted and and successfully employed for the purpose of obtaining a water supply for the British troops in the Abyssinian expedition. The present record contains extracts from standard scientific publications in England showing how extensively and successfully the driven well has, since its first introduction, been employed in England for the purpose of raising water, in which it is admitted, as the facts show, that the process was considered new, differing in substance from any previously known and in use, and ascribed to the American invention.

The next defense relied upon by the appellant is that the evidence fails to establish a case of infringement. It is not important to set out fully the evidence on this point; the substance [70] of it is contained in the opinion of Judge Shipman in this case. 15 Fed. Rep. 109. In reference to it, the court says: "The defendant's counsel strenuously urge that these wells were constructed by boring; that the wells were bored until water was struck—that is, until a supply of water was obtained; and that the wells were finished by pressing the pipes more deeply into the source of supply which had been reached when the workmen 'struck water.' In other words, the defendant seeks to bring the case within the decision of Judge McCrary in Andrews v. Long, 12 Fed. Rep. 871. In this case, however, the witnesses, when they used the common expression 'struck water,' did not mean that they had reached an adequate source of supply for a well, but that they had reached a place where the presence of water manifested itself, and where by continuous excavation an adequate supply would be attained. The wet sand or wet clay upon the auger showed that water was at hand. The well was then finished and a supply of water was obtained by pressing or driving a tube into the ground without removing the earth upward and attaching thereto a pump. When this was done, there was put 'to practical use the new principle of forcing the water in the water bearing strata of the earth from the earth into a well pit, by the use of artificial power applied to create a vacuum in the water bearing strata of the earth, and at the same time in the well pit'. Andrews v. Oross, 8 Fed. Rep. 269."

In other words, the case of the appellant is this: He sought to evade the patent by boring instead of driving until he came to the water bearing stratum. Then, in order to avail himself of the patent, he drove the tube downward into the water bearing stratum, so as to secure those conditions of an air tight connection between the point of the tube and the surrounding earth, which constitute the principle of the driven-well patent. It is, therefore, a clear case of infringement.

The decree of the Circuit Court is accordingly affirmed.

FRANK O. BENNET ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 71-78.)

"Driven-well patent"—a process—continuing infringement—abandonment and dedication—Act of March 3, 1839—rebuttal of presumption—delay of four years.

1. The "driven-well patent," secured by original letters patent No. 73425 and reissued letters patent No. 4372, covers the process of drawing water from the earth by means of a well driven in the manner described therein.

2. The use of a well so constructed is a continuing infringement of said patent.

3. The Act of March 3, 1839, has no effect to invalidate a patent, unless there be proof of abandonment, or of a use of the invention for more than two years prior to the application for the patent.

4. In the case presented, the circumstances stated in the agreed statement of facts are held to sufficiently rebut any presumptions which might otherwise have arisen of an intention to abandon and dedicate the invention to the public from a delay of four years in applying for the patent in question.

5. Upon a bill for the infringement of a patent, the jurisdiction of the court is not defeated by the expiration of the patent by lapse of time pending the proceedings; but a permanent injunction will not be granted.

[72] Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity filed by the appellees May 15, 1883, to restrain the alleged infringement of reissued letters patent No. 4372, issued to Nelson W. Green, for a driven well. The cause was heard by stipulation between the parties upon an agreed statement of facts set out in the record, as follows:

"For the purpose of saving the expense of taking testimony, it is hereby agreed by and between the parties hereto that the above cause and the others hereinafter referred to may be tried upon the following agreed statement of facts, said statement to be accepted as proof of the facts recited as fully and completely as if the same had been duly and formally proven.

"It is agreed that Nelson W. Green was the patentee of a new and valuable process in the construction of wells, and claimed to be its first and original inventor, for which process he received original letters patent of the United States, No. 73425, on the 14th day of January, 1868, and for which reissue letters patent No. 4372 were granted to Nelson W. Green on May 9, 1871, the application for which having been filed February 24, 1871.

"That the title to the letters patent sued on for the State of Ohio is in the complainants.

"That the defendants have had in use on their farm for the past seven or eight years one or more driven wells, which wells were put down for the defendants by an ordinary well [73] driver in the following manner: a tube, of which the lower portion was perforated with small holes and the lower end provided with a point, was driven into the ground until it projected into the water, without removing the earth upwards, as in boring.

"The water then entered the tube through the perforations and was pumped up through the tube by an ordinary pump.

"That the defendants have never driven wells for themselves, except as above described or for other purposes; never have sold or offered for sale driven wells or the materials for driving them, but have simply used their own wells for their personal use on their farms.

"It is agreed that printed copies of the original and reissued letters patent granted to N. W. Green in 1868 and 1871, Nos. 73425 and 4372, respectively, may be offered in evidence at the hearing, and may be accepted as proof with the same force and effect as if formally proven.

"That the said N. W. Green made his alleged invention or discovery as early as 1861, when he put down on his own grounds, at Cortland, New York, the first driven well for the purpose of demonstrating his discovery.

"That he, at the time of his alleged invention, claimed to have made a valuable discovery and to have invented a new process.

"That he then declared an intention to secure his process by letters patent and expressed his belief that large profits would accrue therefrom.

"That he at that time, having been partly educated at West Point, was engaged in organizing a regiment at Cortland, N. Y., his residence, and was expecting soon to take part in the War of the Rebellion.

"That in June, 1861, he put down a well at his house in Cortland, and in October, 1861, he publicly drove a well, in the manner described in his original patent, at the fair grounds near Cortland, for the use of the soldiers in camp, and demonstrated to his own complete satisfaction its success.

"That he gave orders and directions for the [74] construction of proper apparatus for driving such wells, and made arrangements for its transportation with his regiment as it was moved to the seat of war.

"That on the 6th of December, 1861, while in discharge of what seemed to be his duty, he felt compelled to shoot one of the captains of his regiment named McNett; that the shot was not mortal, but inflicted serious injury; that in the then state of the public mind this occasion gave rise to intense public excitement, out of which sprang a controversy of extraordinary bitterness, involving numerous persons and continuing for several years; that the effect upon Green was disastrous in the extreme; that he was suspended from his command, then tried by a court of inquiry at Albany, and reinstated in command; that his regiment, after having, it is said, required the protection of a battery to save it from violence at the hands of evil disposed people of the country, removed to Washington, where Green was relieved from command, and then dismissed the service and subjected to military charges.

"That he was, in addition, harassed by civil suits brought to charge him with a personal liability for articles used by his regiment.

"That he was also arrested and then indicted for the shooting of McNett, and after repeated postponements of the trial, effected because of the excited state of the public mind, was tried in 1866, and, the jury having disagreed, was discharged.

"That during this period he also became involved in church difficulties arising out of the shooting of McNett; was expelled from the church and compelled to appeal to the bishop, and also became involved in litigation with the pastor of his church.

"That his efforts during this period to secure a reversal of the order dismissing him from the service were constant and absorbing, and were attended with such anxiety of mind as to give rise to the charge that he was insane.

"That this state of things continued up to 1866, during which period he was of necessity often absent from Cortland, at Albany and at Washington, and that he was compelled to devote his entire time to the controversy in which he had become involved, abandoning all other occupation and exhausting all his means.

"That in November, 1865, when Green saw, [75] by an advertisement in the papers, that driven wells were being put down, although he was advised by counsel defending him on the indictment for the shooting of McNett not to apply for a patent, as he would thereby increase the number of his enemies and prejudice him on the trial of the indictment, then about to come on, he nevertheless did then, and in opposition to the advice of his counsel, file his application and assert his right to the invention.

"That the said Green, during this period aforesaid, never declared any intention of abandoning his said discovery and invention, and that, having so made his application as aforesaid, original letters patent were granted the said N. W. Green, January 14, 1868.

"It is further agreed that whatever order or decree is made in this cause the same shall be made in all the cases pending in this court in which the same parties are complainants, a list of which cases, with the title and number thereof, is hereto attached and made a part of this stipulation.

"It is further admitted that the complainants' price for settling for infringement under the above patent without suit has been ten dollars per well and the recognition of complainants' rights, and that the complainants offered to settle on such terms with these defendants before bringing suit, which offer was refused."

A decree was rendered in favor of the complainants on the 6th day of December, 1886, but, as at that time the patent had expired, no injunction was granted. The amount of the damages awarded was at the rate of $10 for each well used, that being the amount of royalty which the complainants had offered to take before suit brought, and admitted to be the customary price for the same, as a license fee. The defendant prosecutes the present appeal.

As the patent was in force at the time the bill was filed, and the complainants were entitled to a preliminary injunction at that time, the jurisdiction of the court is not defeated by the expiration of the patent by lapse of time before final decree. [76] There is nothing in the case of Root v. R. Co. 105 U. S. 189 [26:975], to sustain the objection made by the appellant on this account. See also Clark v. Wooster, 119 U. S. 322, 325 [ante, 392], and cases there cited. All other defenses made in the cause, except that of prior public use and the defendant's infringement, have been passed upon in the case of Eames v. Andrews [ante, 1064], just decided.

In the present case the appellant contends that the patentee publicly used his invention more than two years before he applied for his patent, and thereby forfeited his right to a patent under the law. This defense was raised and considered, upon facts substantially the same, in the case of Andrews v. Carman, 13 Blatchf. 307, and also in the case of Andrews v. Cross, 19 Blatchf. 294. The law governing the subject of the alleged dedication and abandonment by Green of his invention prior to obtaining his patent is that which was in force prior to November, 1865, when he made his application. By the Patent Act of 1870, as well as by the Revised Statutes, all rights previously acquired were preserved. The law, therefore, applicable to the question, is to be found in the Acts of 1836 and 1839. The Act of 1839, as has repeatedly been held, has no effect to invalidate a patent, unless there be proof of abandonment, or of a use of the invention for more than two years prior to the application for the patent. The only facts from which such an abandonment or dedication can be inferred are that Green, in June, 1861, put down a well at his house in Cortland, New York; that in October, 1861, he publicly drove a well, in the manner described in his original patent, at the fair grounds near Cortland, for the use of the soldiers in camp, and demonstrated to his complete satisfaction its success; and that he gave orders and directions for the construction of proper apparatus for the driving of such wells, and made arrangements for its transportation with his regiment as it was moved to the seat of war. The circumstances of delay, which intervened between that date and the time when he made his application for his patent in November, 1865, are stated in the agreed statement of facts. Those circumstances sufficiently rebut any presumptions which might otherwise have arisen of an intention on his part to abandon and dedicate to the use of the public the invention described in his patent. The wells made by Green himself at Cortland, and at the fair grounds near Cortland, for the use of his [77] soldiers, were his first experiments. In respect to these, it was said by Judge Benedict, in Andrews v. Carman, 13 Blatchf. 307, 325: "The first experiment was a success in this: that it proved the possibility of obtaining a supply of water by this process; but, of course, it could not prove that a tube could be driven down to a water bearing stratum in all localities, with the cheapness and dispatch necessary to render the process one of general utility. It was natural therefore to suppose that, before the process could be declared to be satisfactory, other experiments, in other and different localities, should be made. He could, by law, use his invention for this purpose, and permit it to be used, for two years, without forfeiting his right to a patent. Under such circumstances, it would be going far to say that his act of permitting the use of his process at the camp in Cortland, where his regiment was then in camp, and of providing material wherewith to construct such wells for his regiment when it should move into hostile territory, amounted to a dedication of his invention to public use, and worked a forfeiture of his right to it."

Section 7 of the Act of March 3, 1839, 5 Stat. at L. 354, protects everyone who had purchased or constructed the subject of the invention prior to the application for the patent, and adds as follows: "And no patent shall be held to be invalid by reason of such purchase, sale, or use prior to the application for a patent as aforesaid, except on proof of abandonment of such invention to the public, or that such purchase, sale, or prior use has been for more than two years prior to such application for a patent." There is no evidence in the record of any use or sale of the invention by Green before his application for a patent, and no evidence from which to conclude that any use of any driven well by others before his application was consented to or allowed by him, except in the instances mentioned at Cortland, which were merely experimental tests, made by himself. Much less is there any evidence to show that there was any use of the invention by others for more than two years prior to his application.

Upon the question of infringement, the agreed statement of facts shows the following: "That the defendants have had in use on their farm [78] for the past seven or eight years one or more driven wells, which wells were put down for the defendants by an ordinary well driver in the following manner: a tube, of which the lower portion was perforated with small holes and the lower end provided with a point, was driven into the ground until it projected into the water, without removing the earth upwards, as in boring. The water then entered the tube through the perforations and was pumped up through the tube by an ordinary pump. That the defendants have never driven wells for themselves, except as above described, or for other purposes; never have sold or offered for sale driven wells, or the materials for driving them, but have simply used their own wells for their personal use on their farms."

It is now contended, on the part of the appellant, that the claim of the patent is for the process of driving the well, and not for the use of the well after it has been driven, and that consequently the appellant is not shown to have infringed; but, as has been shown in the case of Eames v. Andrews, the patent covers the process of drawing water from the earth by means of a well driven in the manner described in the patent. The use of a well so constructed is, therefore, a continuing infringement, as every time water is drawn from it the patented process is necessarily used. As was said by Mr. Justice Blatchford in Andrews v. Cross, 19 Blatchf. 294, 305: "Under this construction the defendant has infringed by using the pump in a driven well, constructed in a house hired by him, to obtain a supply of water for the use of his family, although he may not have paid for driving the well, or have procured it to be driven. Such use of the well was a use of the patented process."

The decree of the Circuit Court is accordingly affirmed.

BENJAMIN B. KNIGHT ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 79-97.)

Common carriers—bill of lading is both a receipt and a contract—carrier only required to deliver goods actually received—deficiency in quality—liability as warehouseman—delivery of cotton to be compressed—liability to broker—control—when liability as common carrier begins—instructions—pleading—local statute.

1. A common carrier is not responsible for a difference in the quality of goods carried as compared with that described in the bill of lading if he safely delivers the very goods received by him for transportation.

2. A bill of lading is at once a receipt and a contract. It is an acknowledgment of the receipt of the property and a contract to carry safely and deliver.

3. In an action to charge the defendant as a common carrier with damages for a failure to deliver cotton of the quality called for by certain bills of lading, issued by its agent, it is held: that the defendant is not liable as a common carrier by reason of anything occurring after the transportation actually commenced; that the plaintiffs cannot recover on the ground of a liability on the part of the defendant as a warehouseman, the action being on the bills of lading alone, and its liability, if any, as a warehouseman being to the broker, who delivered the cotton to the defendant to compress it before shipment, and not to the plaintiffs; that its liability as a common carrier did not commence until the cotton was designated and set apart by said broker or his agents for immediate transportation, all of the cotton delivered to the defendant by said broker being (until so designated and set apart) subject, so far as grading, classifying and marking was concerned, to his control; that certain instructions, set out in the opinion of the court, are erroneous; and that the defenses made by the defendants were open to it under the pleadings, a Statute of Illinois requiring a plea to be verified by affidavit under certain circumstances, not being applicable to the circumstances of the case.

Argued and submitted May 3, 1887. Decided May 23, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. John F. Dillon, for plaintiff in error:

The agent of the Railway Company had no authority to issue bills of lading for cotton not actually received by him for transportation; and bills so issued can impose no liability upon the Railway Company to deliver the goods therein described; but it may be shown, even as against an innocent indorsee for value, that such goods were never received for carriage.

By the insertion of the words "contents unknown," in the bill of lading, the Railway Company expressly exonerated itself from all liability in regard to the quality of the cotton which it received and carried under these bills, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary cannot be held responsible for nondelivery of the cotton sued for, upon a warranty that the cotton carried should be of the quality indicated in the bills, and by the marks upon the bales themselves.

R. Co.* 90 N. Y. 430.

As to all cotton in the compress warehouse, and until its actual delivery upon the loading platform for shipment, the Railway Company can at most be deemed only a warehouseman, and its liability as such cannot be inquired into in this action. It was not in issue.

Y. 188; Barron v. Eldredge, 100 Mass. 455; Angell, Carriers, § 134, and note.

The court below erred in charging the jury that the Railway Company was liable in case of connivance by its agent at the substitution of an inferior quality of cotton in the place of that called for by the bills of lading, both because there was no such issue, and no evidence to warrant such a charge, and the charge misconceived the actual case in hand.

Messrs. Julius Rosenthal and Abram M. Pence, for defendants in error:

Under the pleadings the defendant is not entitled to raise any question as to the validity of the bills of lading, and is estopped from claiming that the cotton described in the bills was not on hand at time same were issued. Defendant's plea not being verified by affidavit, it is precluded from controverting the execution of the bills of lading.

The bills of lading in this case were issued by an agent of defendant. Confidence had been reposed in such agent, and apparent authority had been conferred upon him by the defendant Company to receipt for property and issue such bills of lading; and hence such principal, as against an innocent purchaser for value, must suffer from an actual exercise of authority not exceeding the appearance of that which is granted to such agent. The defendant Company is estopped by the acts and declarations of its agent, upon which plaintiff relied and parted with his money, from denying that it had received the cotton in question, as stated in its bill of lading.

St. Louis & Iron Mt. R. R. Co. v. Larned, 108 Ill. 293; Armour v. Mich. Cent. R. R. Co. 65 N. Y. 111.

The evidence shows that at the time these bills of lading were signed there was a large amount of cotton of this grade and of these marks in the hands of the Railway Company; and also that in December 5,000 bales of cotton were in its possession and that over 5,000 bales of cotton, with same marks as this, were sent to parties other than plaintiffs.

If other persons had rights superior to plaintiffs to this cotton, it should have been shown by defendant. The burden was upon them to show it. And upon our proving that cotton of the quality and description of ours came into the hands of defendant, although after the bills of lading were given, yet, when it came into such possession, it became the property of the holders of the bills.

[81] Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of assumpsit brought by the defendants in error against the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway Company in the Superior Court of Cook County, Illinois, and removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois by the defendant below, the parties being citizens of different States. The declaration set out several similar causes of action in different counts against the Railway Company as a common carrier, in one of which it was alleged that the defendant, having received from one G. T. Potter a large number of bales of cotton, described in a certain bill of lading acknowledging receipt thereof, thereby agreed safely to carry the same from Texarkana, in the State of Arkansas, to St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, and thence to Woonsocket, in the State of Rhode Island; and avers that, in violation of its promise and duty, and by reason of its negligence, the said goods became and were wholly lost. The plaintiffs below sued as purchasers of the cotton from Potter and assignees of the bills of lading. The bills of lading sued upon were similar in their tenor, except as to the description of the articles named therein, and commenced as follows: "Received from G. T. Potter the following packages, contents unknown, in apparent good order, marked and numbered as per margin, to be transported [82] from Texarkana, Ark., to St. Louis, and delivered to the consignee or a connecting common carrier." A specimen of what was contained on the margin is as follows:

"Marked.	List of articles.	Weight.
"[P. P.]	...Seventy-four bales cotton, adv. ch'g's $111.00	...85,964

"Order shipper notify—

"B. B. & R. KNIGHT,
Providence, R. I.

"Deliver cotton Woonsocket, R. I."

Some of the bills of lading specified that the goods were to be transported from Texarkana to Providence, R. I., to be forwarded from St. Louis to destination. The whole number of bales in controversy is 525.

To the declaration the defendant filed a plea of the general issue, which was not verified.

The ground of the complaint on the part of the plaintiffs was, not that they did not receive the whole number of bales called for by the bills of lading, but that, as to the 525 bales in controversy, they were not of the grade and quality designated by the marks contained in the bills of lading. By reason of this difference in quality, on the arrival of the cotton at destination, the plaintiffs refused to receive the same, and, after notice to the defendant, caused the same to be sold for its account. The amount claimed was the loss thereby incurred.

The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict and judgment rendered for the plaintiffs for $11,808.51. A bill of exceptions, duly taken, sets out the entire evidence given on the trial, and the charge of the court to the jury, with the exceptions taken by the plaintiff in error.

The court below in its charge to the jury gave in outline a statement of the main features of the case sufficient for present purposes, as follows:

"The proof tends to show that Potter was a cotton broker at Texarkana, Arkansas, in the fall of 1879 and winter following; that he bought most of his cotton at points in Texas on the lines of railroads running south and southwest and west from Texarkana, and that [83] it was brought to Texarkana by these railroads and there delivered upon the platform of what is known in the testimony as the Cotton Compress Company; that this compress company was a corporation whose business it was to compress cotton, and that all the cotton bought by Potter and delivered at Texarkana was to be there compressed before it was shipped East and North by the defendant. This compress company had a large warehouse, where cotton was stored until it could be compressed and made ready for shipment.

"The testimony tends to show the course of business to have been this: cotton was bought by Potter and delivered into the compress house. It was there weighed, classed, or graded by Potter, and marks put upon each bale indicating the grade or quality of the cotton and the lot to which it belonged. When Potter had so weighed, graded, and marked a number of bales he made out a bill of lading, describing certain bales of cotton by the marks on the bales, had the superintendent of the compress company warehouse certify to the fact that the cotton called for by these bills of lading was in the warehouse, and the bills of lading thus certified to by the letters 'O K' and the signature of Martin, the superintendent of the compress warehouse, were signed by O'Connor, the freight agent of the defendant at Texarkana. Potter then drew drafts on the persons to whom he had sold cotton of the grade called for by these bills of lading, attached these bills of lading to the drafts, and some local bank at Texarkana or some of the adjacent towns or cities cashed these drafts, and they went forward to some correspondent of such bank for collection, and in due course of mail and long before the actual arrival of the cotton the drafts were paid; and this seems, from the proof, to have been the course of business between the plaintiffs and Potter.

"There is also testimony in the case, given by Potter himself, which tends to show that the bills of lading were issued upon cotton before it had been received into the warehouse upon some understanding or agreement be- [84] tween Potter and O'Connor that they should be so issued, and that Potter would afterwards put the cotton to respond to those bills of lading into the warehouse.

"It is conceded that the defendant, and it is in fact provided in the bills of lading that the defendant, the Railroad Company, should compress this cotton before shipping to the North or East, and that the expense of compressing was paid by the defendant out of its charges for transportation; that some time necessarily elapsed between the arrival of the cotton in the compress warehouse and the time when it was compressed and made ready for shipment. Especially was this so in the fall and early part of the winter, when there was a large rush on cotton, and it was impossible to compress and handle the cotton as fast as it came in. The cotton therefore accumulated in large quantities in the compress house, awaiting compression and getting ready for shipment.

"And there is also proof in the case tending to show that when it was ready for shipment it was turned out on to what was known as the loading platform, and was there shipped to such consignees as Potter directed; that is, bills of lading having been given to various persons, Potter directed to whom he would have each lot, as it was turned out ready for shipment, sent or forwarded.

"The controversy in this case is wholly in regard to 525 bales of cotton covered by the eight bills of lading offered in evidence in this case. These bills of lading, as you will remember, covered a large amount of other cotton which it is conceded was received in due course of business, and answered to the marks of quality which were upon the bales; but it is claimed on the part of the plaintiffs that 525 bales of the whole number of bales covered by the bills of lading were not of the quality called for by these bills of lading, and this suit is wholly in regard to those.

"The plaintiffs claim that, on or about the 9th of April, 1880, there still remained unshipped from Texarkana and in the compress warehouse 525 bales of this cotton, for which they held bills of lading; that, on or about the 9th of April, there remained in the compress house about 800 bales of cotton of an inferior grade [85] to that indicated by the marks on the cotton called for by these bills of lading; and that certain employés of Potter, as plaintiffs insist, with the knowledge of O'Connor, the defendant's freight agent, re-marked this cotton with marks indicating the grade or quality called for by the bills of lading; and the defendant forwarded this inferior cotton to the plaintiffs, instead of the actual quality called for by these bills of lading.

"The plaintiff's proof also tends to show that when this inferior cotton arrived at its destination, Providence, Rhode Island, plaintiffs declined to accept it, caused it to be put into an auction house, and sold for the benefit of whom it might concern, notified the defendant of what they had done before this sale took place, giving the defendant opportunity to reclaim and take the cotton if it saw fit, and dispose of it itself; and this suit is now brought to recover the difference between the proceeds of this inferior cotton, as the plaintiffs claim, and the drafts and freight they have paid."

It is not denied that the Railroad Company delivered to the plaintiffs below the whole number of bales of cotton mentioned in the bills of lading, with external marks thereon as called for, and that no change was made in the cotton or in the marking thereof after it was loaded on the cars for transportation to Texarkana, and that no damage or loss was occasioned by reason of any want of care or diligence in the transportation. The bill of lading contains no warranty that the goods described shall answer any particular quality; on the contrary, it expressly specifies that the contents of the packages are unknown. That a bill of lading in such cases does not operate as such a guaranty appears from the case of Clark v. Barnwell, 53 U. S. 12 How. 272 [13:985], where Mr. Justice Nelson, delivering the opinion of the court, p. 283 [989], said: "It is obvious, therefore, that the acknowledgment of the master as to the condition of the goods when received on board extended only to the external condition of the cases, excluding any implication as to the quantity or quality of the article, condition of it at the time received on board, or whether properly packed or not in the boxes."

[86] The observations of the Master of the Rolls, Lord Esher, in the case of Cox v. Bruce, L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 147, are very much in point. He says: "But, then, secondly, it is said that, because the plaintiffs are indorsees for value of the bill of lading without notice, they have another right, that they are entitled to rely on a representation made in the bill of lading that the bales bore such and such marks, and that there is consequently an estoppel against the defendants. That raises a question as to the true meaning of the doctrine in Grant v. Norway, 10 C. B. 665. It is clearly impossible, consistently with that decision, to assert that the mere fact of a statement being made in the bill of lading estops the shipowner and gives a right of action against him if untrue, because it was there held that a bill of lading signed in respect of goods not on board the vessel did not bind the shipowner. The ground of that decision, according to my view, was not merely that the captain has no authority to sign a bill of lading in respect of goods not on board, but that the nature and limitations of the captain's authority are well known among mercantile persons, and that he is only authorized to perform all things usual in the line of business in which he is employed. Therefore the doctrine of that case is not confined to the case where the goods are not put on board the ship. That the captain has authority to bind his owners with regard to the weight, condition, and value of the goods under certain circumstances may be true; but it appears to me absurd to content that persons are entitled to assume that he has authority, though his owners really gave him no such authority, to estimate and determine and state on the bill of lading, so as to bind his owners, the particular mercantile quality of the goods before they are put on board; as, for instance, that they are goods containing such and such a percentage of good or bad material, or of such and such a season's growth. To ascertain such matters is obviously quite outside the scope of the functions and capacities of a ship's captain and of the contract of carriage with which he has to do."

It follows, therefore, that if any liability attached to the plaintiff in error upon these bills of lading, it must be by reason of what occurred

[87] prior to the actual loading of the cotton upon the cars at Texarkana, when the transportation actually commenced. If Potter had never delivered to the plaintiff in error any cotton at all to make good the 525 bales called for by the bills of lading, it is clear that the plaintiff in error would not be liable for the deficiency. This is well established by the cases of The Freeman v. Buckingham, 59 U. S. 18 How. 182 [15:341], and Pollard v. Vinton, 105 U. S. 7 [26:998]. In the latter case, Mr. Justice Miller, delivering the opinion of the court, and speaking of the nature and effect of a bill of lading, says: "It is an instrument of a twofold character. It is at once a receipt and a contract. In the former character, it is an acknowledgment of the receipt of property on board his vessel by the owner of the vessel. In the latter, it is a contract to carry safely and deliver. The receipt of the goods lies at the foundation of the contract to carry and deliver. If no goods are actually received, there can be no valid contract to carry or to deliver." And the doctrine is applicable to transportation contracts made in that form by railway companies and other carriers by land, as well as carriers by sea. Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Wilkins, 44 Md. 11; Miller v. Hannibal & St. Jo. R. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 430. A fortiori the carrier is not responsible, as we have already seen, for a deficiency in the quality as compared with that described in the bill of lading, if he safely delivers the very goods he actually received for transportation.

It becomes necessary, therefore, further to inquire what facts, happening before the actual loading of the cotton in question on the cars of the plaintiff in error at Texarkana, create a liability on its part to make good the loss complained of by reason of its duty as a common carrier under the bills of lading sued on. On this point, the court below charged the jury as follows:

"1. This compress warehouse must be deemed the warehouse of the defendant. If you find from the proof that it was used by the defendant as the place for storing the cotton while the defendant was compressing the same —that is, if while the defendant was getting the cotton ready for shipment North it used the compress warehouse for the purpose of storage, then the compress warehouse must be deemed [88] the defendant's warehouse for that purpose.

"2. The proof without controversy seems to be that it was understood between Potter and the defendant that all the cotton covered by these bills of lading was to be compressed before it was to be put on the defendant's cars for actual transportation. While it remained in the compress house for compression, awaiting further shipment, the defendant's liability was that of a warehouseman only, and not that of a carrier; that is, the defendant was liable for due and ordinary care, such as warehousemen are expected to take of property placed in a warehouse for keeping. A common carrier's liability is of an extraordinary character, and covers every risk that the property can be subject to, except a loss by the act of God or by an unavoidable accident, and by the public enemy, unless this extraordinary liability which the law imposes is limited or restricted by the contract between the parties, so that this extraordinary liability, as a common carrier, did not commence until the property was actually loaded or taken for transportation; but the liability was that of a warehouseman until the transportation was actually commenced."

After charging the jury, in the same connection, that the bills of lading were not negotiable, so that any defense open to the plaintiff in error, if sued by Potter, might be made against the plaintiffs below, notwithstanding they had paid value for the property on the faith of the bill of lading, the court further said:

"But this rule must be taken with this qualification: that after the issuing of a bill of lading by the defendant as a warehouseman or common carrier no collusive agreement or conduct between the defendant and Potter can be allowed to prejudice the plaintiffs' rights as holders of these bills of lading. The plaintiffs have the right to have the contract performed substantially as it was made between Potter and the defendant. There can be no substantial change in the terms of the contract to the prejudice of the plaintiffs or any person to whom [89] the contract or bill of lading may be assigned."

The court further charged the jury that the defendant, as a common carrier, was not a guarantor of the quality of the commodity it assumed to transport, and added as follows:

"This rule may, however, be subjected to a qualification or limitation under the facts in this case as you may find them to be. The proof tends to show that Potter marked quite a large number of bales with the same grade and lot marks as those described in these bills of lading; and there is proof tending to show that no specific bales of cotton were set apart or considered as forming the particular bales to be shipped on these bills of lading; but it was understood between Potter and the defendant that out of the lot or quantity of bales marked in the manner designated in these bills of lading a sufficient number to make up what are called for by those bills of lading should be shipped. If you so find, then the defendant was bound to ship the number of bales called for by these bills of lading out of the larger quantity bearing the same common marks; and this would be the contract, if you find from the proof that the cotton in question was to be drawn from a larger lot bearing the same common marks.

"The testimony on the part of the defendant tends to show that the defendant's agents did not know at the time of the issuing of these bills of lading that the marks on these bales indicated the quality or the grade of the cotton; that, so far as Mr. O'Connor and the other agents of the defendant who had the responsible charge of the defendant's business at Texarkana were concerned, the marks only indicated a means of identification, and the quality of the cotton was not considered by them; that a bale of cotton to them was only a bale of cotton, without regard to quality; that in shipping the cotton in fulfillment of these bills of lading they only referred to the marks as a means of identifying or determining what cotton they were to ship under each bill of lading.

"As has been stated, the plaintiffs' proof tends to show that on or about the 9th of April the employés of Potter, with the knowledge of the defendant's agent, marked a lot of 800 bales of inferior cotton, then in the compress warehouse, with grade marks corresponding to those called for by these bills of lading, and that the defendant shipped this inferior cotton [90] to the plaintiffs in fulfillment of its contract under those bills of lading; while the defendant's proof tends to show that the defendant's agents had no knowledge of the fact that this cotton was of a quality inferior to that called for by these bills of lading, and had no knowledge of the fact that the grade marks on the bales so shipped had been changed from marks indicating a lower grade to those indicating the grade called for by the bills of lading, but that, on the contrary, they accepted the cotton with the belief that it was the cotton called for by the bills of lading, and which had been delayed in the warehouse up to that time for the purpose of compressing and getting it ready for shipment.

"4. If the proof in the case satisfies you that the defendant's agents knew or were informed at the time they shipped this cotton to the plaintiffs or accepted it for shipment that it was of a quality inferior to that called for by the bills of lading which the defendant had issued for it, and knew that the marks on those bales or packages had been changed from marks indicating a lower grade or quality of cotton to marks indicating the grade called for by the bills of lading, then the defendant is liable in this action for the difference in value between the cotton of the quality called for by the bills of lading and the value of the cotton actually shipped—that is to say, if the proof satisfies you that the agent of the defendant connived at the substitution of a lower and inferior quality of cotton in place of that called for by the bills of lading, although the marks may have been such as called for by the bills of lading, then the defendant is liable. While, if from the proof you are satisfied that when the agents of the defendant actually shipped the cotton they had no knowledge of the difference in quality between the cotton so shipped and that called for by the bills of lading, and had no knowledge that the cotton was, in fact, inferior to that called for by the bills of lading, and that the grade marks on the bales had been changed from marks indicating a lower grade to marks called for by the bills of lading, then the defendant is not liable.

"You are to determine, then, as a question of fact, from the testimony:

"First. Whether it was in the course of [91] business in the handling of this cotton in the warehouse to set apart and keep separate the cotton covered by each bill of lading from the time such bill of lading was issued, or whether the defendant's agent, O'Connor, only satisfied himself, through the agency of Martin or his employés, that there was enough cotton, as stated in the bills of lading, to fill such bill as part of a common lot answering to the same description. As, for illustration, there might be in a railroad warehouse in this city 10,000 barrels of flour of one brand, and ten bills of lading might be issued, each to a different person, calling each for 1,000 barrels of this lot of flour. No one barrel would be specifically set apart as belonging to any one of these bills of lading; but any one of the 10,000 barrels would be liable to be shipped on any of these bills of lading—that is, it would be assumed that the entire lot was uniform and alike in quality, and it would, therefore, make no difference to the person to whom it was shipped which particular barrel of flour he got. If such was the mode of doing business in this compress warehouse, and Potter understood it, then the defendant was not obliged to keep separate cotton called for by each bill of lading, but could fill the bill of lading out of the common lot bearing the same marks.

"Second. Did the agents of the defendant in charge of the issue of these bills of lading and the shipment of this cotton know the grade marks of this cotton called for by the bills of lading; and did they know that this 525 bales in question was of an inferior grade to that called for by the bills of lading; and did they knowingly accept this inferior quality of cotton in place of that called for by the bills of lading, and ship the same to plaintiffs?

"As I have stated, a common carrier is not, as a rule, a guarantor of the quality of the goods transported, but it is bound to transport and deliver the identical goods covered by its contract, where such identity can be established; and, therefore, if at the time these bills of lading were issued it was not intended that [92] they should cover any specific bales, but only a given number of bales, bearing certain common marks without regard to quality, as understood by the defendant's agents, and that the defendant did ship the number of bales called for by the bills of lading, and marked as required by the bills of lading, with no knowledge or information that the cotton contained in those bales was inferior to that called for by the bills of lading, then the defendant is not liable.

"But if you are satisfied, from the proof, that the agents of the defendant knew at the time they received and shipped the 525 bales in question that it was inferior in quality to that called for by the bills of lading, and that fraudulent or false grade marks had been put upon these bales corresponding to the marks called for by the bills of lading, then the defendant is liable.

"The defendant having, as I have already stated to you, assumed the responsibility of a warehouseman in regard to this cotton while it was being compressed and prepared for shipment, was obliged to see to it that the cotton it had receipted for was kept on hand for shipment, and had no right, knowingly, to allow a lower grade of cotton to be substituted for that called for by the bills of lading."

The suggestion in the charge of the court of a possible ground of liability on the part of the defendant as a warehouseman was entirely outside of the issues. The defendant was not sued upon the ground of any such alleged liability. No facts and circumstances out of which any duty as warehouseman could arise were set out in the declaration; the action was upon the bills of lading alone. The contract alleged to have been made and broken was contained in them. The duty charged to have been violated was the duty of the defendant as a common carrier for an alleged negligence in the transportation of the goods. And if the defendant could be supposed, upon the facts proven, to have incurred liability in its character as warehouseman, as distinguished from its capacity as a carrier, that liability was not incurred in respect to the plaintiffs. It is not charged that the defendant, as a warehouseman, received any goods as their property for the purpose of storage and safekeeping. Its relation as a warehouseman was with Potter, and him alone. It was an error, therefore, in the [93] court to charge the jury that the defendant might be charged in this action for the loss in question upon its responsibility as a warehouseman to the plaintiffs.

It may be contended, however, that in one possible view of the fact this error was not prejudicial to the defendant. It may be said that the defendant's liability as a common carrier commenced at a time antecedent to the delivery of the cotton to be loaded on the cars; that it might have arisen upon a prior delivery of the cotton in question in the warehouse to be compressed, and then transported, the duty of compressing it, in order to prepare it for transportation, having been undertaken by the defendant. This, however, could only be when the specific goods, as the property of the plaintiffs, were delivered for that purpose into the exclusive possession and control of the defendant. Such was not the case in the present instance. No specific bales of cotton, as the property of the plaintiffs, separate from all others, were delivered to the defendant for them until the 525 bales in controversy were set apart and delivered to the defendant for immediate transportation on its cars; and prior to that time all cotton received in the warehouse to be compressed was received as the property of Potter, on his account, and subject, so far as grading, classifying, and marking were concerned, to his control, and none of it could be considered as having passed into the possession of the defendant as a common carrier for transportation until designated and set apart by Potter or his agents. The cotton received at the compress warehouse came consigned to Potter upon bills of lading issued by other railroad and transportation companies at the point of shipment for delivery to him at Texarkana. Supposing, as one view of the evidence authorizes, the bills of lading were issued by the agents of the defendant to Potter in advance of the actual delivery of the cotton in the warehouse, on the faith of the bills of lading produced and surrendered by him given by other carriers; still, the cotton, as it came and accumulated in the warehouse for the purpose of being compressed, continued to be the property of Potter, subject to his control in the respects already mentioned; and until specific lots were marked and designated, so as to correspond with the bills of lading previously issued by the defendant, the latter had no possession of the property as a carrier. The undisputed facts are that the whole quantity of cotton purchased by Potter, and received on his account in the warehouse, did not answer the grades and descriptions according to which he had sold it to different purchasers. He was unable out of the cotton to perform all of these contracts. The whole number of bales received by him were sufficient in number, and they were all transported according to his directions. It is not claimed that any of them were converted to the use of the Railroad Company, or that any of them were delivered by the Railroad Company, after they were received for transportation, to any other than the proper consignees. [94]

The court below, however, charged the jury that, notwithstanding "no specific bales of cotton were set apart or considered as forming the particular bales to be shipped on these bills of lading," if "it was understood between Potter and the defendant that, out of the lot or quantity of bales marked in the manner designated in these bills of lading, a sufficient number to make up what are called for by those bills of lading should be shipped, that "then the defendant was bound to ship the number of bales called for by these bills of lading out of the larger quantity bearing the same common marks," if the jury "find from the proof that the cotton in question was to be drawn from a larger lot bearing the same common marks."

This charge seems to assume that, during the progress of the receipt and accumulation of cotton for Potter in the warehouse, there were a sufficient number of bales of the proper grade and quality, and from time to time so marked, to satisfy the bills of lading sued on; and that it was, therefore, the duty of the defendant so to apply them; but it ignores the fact that they were actually applied to satisfy other bills of lading in the hands of parties equally entitled to call for them, and also the more important, because controlling, fact that they were thus applied by the order and direction of Potter, the owner and consignor, who had the right so [95] to direct. There was no relation established between the plaintiffs and the defendant, in respect to the cotton described in their bills of lading, out of which any duty or obligation could arise with respect to it on the part of the defendant until the specific lots of cotton intended for the plaintiffs had been separated and set apart by Potter, and by him delivered to the defendant for immediate transportation, according to the terms of the bills of lading.

The court also instructed the jury, as shown by the extracts from the charge already made, that if the agent of the defendant accepted the cotton in question for shipment, knowing at the time that it was of a quality inferior to that called for by the bills of lading which the defendant had issued for it, and the marks on the bales or packages had been changed from marks indicating a lower grade or quality of cotton to marks indicating the grade called for by the bills of lading, then the defendant was liable. This charge seems to have been given independently of any other circumstances than the mere fact of such knowledge. Possibly it was intended to be taken only in connection with the previous portion of the charge already considered, fixing upon the defendant the duty of selecting the specific quantity called for by these bills of lading out of any larger lot that may from time to time have been on hand in the warehouse answering the same description; and this instruction, therefore, may have been intended by the court as a qualification of what had been previously said. It stands, however, and may have been so understood by the jury, as a complete and separate statement of a distinct ground of liability. In either view, we think it erroneous. If intended as a qualification of the preceding instruction, it does not have the effect of correcting it in the particulars in which we have found it to be erroneous; standing by itself, we think it also to be erroneous. Taken, as it must be, in view of the undisputed facts, it would make it to have been the duty of the defendant, when the cotton in question was tendered by Potter for delivery to the Railroad Company to be carried under the terms of the bills of lading sued on, to have [96] refused the shipment altogether, on the ground that the goods offered did not correspond in grade and quality with those called for by the bills of lading. As we have already seen, the defendant undertook no such obligation in respect to these plaintiffs. The only alternative, if they did not receive them, would be to reject them altogether, and to refuse to carry them. In that event, upon the facts as they stood, the plaintiffs would have lost the whole 525 bales, instead of merely the difference between the value of those actually carried and those which Potter had agreed to deliver. For, on this supposition, Potter had no other cotton except this to deliver, and the case would have stood, as between the plaintiffs and the defendant, upon bills of lading where no property at all had been received by the carrier for transportation, bringing it exactly within the rule declared in Pollard v. Vinton, 105 U. S. 7 [26: 998].

It is argued, however, on the part of the defendants in error, that the defenses made by the defendant below, based on the propositions we have considered, were not open to it on the pleadings. The only plea was the general issue of nonassumpsit, not verified by an affidavit of its truth. The law of Illinois, as declared by statute, Hurd's Rev. Stat. Ill. Practice Act, § 34, declares that "No person shall be permitted to deny on trial the execution or assignment of any instrument in writing, whether sealed or not, upon which any action may have been brought, or which shall be pleaded or set up by way of defense or set-off, or is admissible under the pleadings when a copy is filed, unless the person so denying the same shall, if defendant, verify his plea by affidavit." This statute regulates the practice and pleadings in similar cases in the Circuit Court of the United States for that district by virtue of section 914 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. This provision, however, is not applicable to the circumstances of this case. The execution of the bills of lading, which are the written instruments on which the action is founded, is not denied by anything set up on the part of the defendant below. Their existence and validity, so far as their form and terms are involved, are not in question. The only questions made and decided [97] are those which relate to their legal effect when considered with reference to the facts and circumstances of the case as disclosed in the evidence. The defense actually shown by them, so far as the present record is concerned, is not that the bills of lading were not valid and binding, but that the contract contained in them has been fully performed by the defendant.

In accordance with these views the judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to grant a new trial.

HENRY H. SHUFELDT & CO. ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 27-40.)

Jurisdiction—distinct decrees—general rules—review of authorities—suit by general creditors to set aside conveyance as fraudulent.

1. Distinct decrees against distinct parties on distinct causes of action, or on a single cause of action in which there are distinct liabilities, cannot be joined to give this court jurisdiction on appeal.

2. Speaking generally, this court holds: that the joinder in one suit of several plaintiffs or defendants, who might have sued or been sued in separate actions, does not enlarge the appellate jurisdiction; that when property or money is claimed by several persons suing together, the test is whether they claim it under one common right, the adverse party having no interest in its apportionment or distribution among them, or claim it under separate and distinct rights each of which is contested by the adverse party; that when two persons are sued, or two parcels of property are sought to be recovered or charged, by one person in one suit, the test is whether the defendants' alleged liability to the plaintiff, or claim to the property, is joint or several; and that, so far as affected by any such joinder, the right of appeal is mutual, because the matter in dispute between the parties is that which is asserted on the one side and denied on the other.

3. In a suit by general creditors, only one of whose debts exceeds $5,000, the decree having set aside a conveyance in trust for the benefit of preferred creditors as fraudulent, a motion to dismiss the appeal as to all the complainants except the one whose debt exceeds such sum is granted.

Submitted April 11, 1887. Decided May 23, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia. Motion to dismiss. Granted.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was a motion to dismiss an appeal in equity. The material facts, appearing by the record, were as follows: Jenkins made a deed of assignment of a large amount of property to Watkins, in trust to sell it and to apply the proceeds to the payment of his debts, first, to Gibson for more than $20,000, next, to other persons named, and lastly, to his creditors generally. Shufeldt & Co. filed a bill in equity in the circuit court against Jenkins, Watkins and [28] Gibson, to have the assignment set aside as fraudulent and void against themselves and other unpreferred creditors of Gibson, and for general relief. The Mill Creek Distilling Company filed a similar bill. The defendants answered severally, denying the allegations of the bills, and praying to be dismissed with costs. By consent of the parties and order of the court, the two bills and intervening petitions of other unpreferred creditors were heard together as one cause. . At the hearing upon pleadings and proofs, a receiver was appointed, the assignment was adjudged to be fraudulent and void as to the plaintiffs and petitioners, and the case was referred to a master; and upon the return of his report a final decree was entered for the distribution of the fund in the receiver's hands, paying $6,756.22 to the Mill Creek Distilling Company, $3,943.21 to Shufeldt & Co., and a less sum to each of the petitioning creditors. Gibson and Watkins appealed to this court, and the appellees now moved to dismiss the appeal as to all of themselves except the Mill Creek Distilling Company.

Messrs. William A. Maury, John A. Coke and W. W. Crump, for appellees, in support of motion.

No counsel appeared for appellants.

Mr. Justice Gray, after stating the case as above reported, delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this motion can hardly be considered an open one. But the subject has been so often misunderstood, that the court has thought it convenient to review the former decisions, and the grounds on which they rest.

By the Act of February 16, 1875, chap. 77, section 3, which differs from earlier laws only in increasing the amount required to give this court appellate jurisdiction from a Circuit Court of the United States, it is necessary that "the matter in dispute shall exceed the sum or value of five thousand dollars, exclusive of costs." 18 Stat. at. L. 316.

[29] The sum or value really in dispute between the parties in the case before this court, as shown by the whole record, is the test of its appellate jurisdiction, without regard to the collateral effect of the judgment in another suit between the same or other parties. Elgin v. Marshall, 106 U. S. 578 [27: 249]; Hilton v. Dickinson, 108 U. S. 165 [27: 688]; The Jessie Williamson, Jr. Id. 305 [27: 730]; New Jersey Zinc Co. v. Trotter, Id. 564 [27: 828]; Opelika v. Daniel, 109 U. S. 108 [27: 873]; Wabash etc. R. Co. v. Knox, 110 U. S. 304 [28: 155]; Bradstreet Co. v. Higgins, 112 U. S. 227 [28: 715]; Bruce v. Manchester & K. R. R. 117 U. S. 514 [29: 990].

The value of property sued for is not always the matter in dispute. In replevin, for instance, if the action is brought as a means of trying the title to property, the value of the property replevied is the matter in dispute; but if the replevin is of property distrained for rent, the amount for which avowry is made is the real matter in dispute, and the limit of jurisdiction. Peyton v. Robertson, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 527 [6: 151].

When the object of a suit is to apply property worth more, to the payment of a debt for less, than the jurisdictional amount, it is the amount of the debt, and not the value of the property that determines the jurisdiction of this court. This is well illustrated by two cases, in one of which the appeal was taken by the creditor, and in the other by a mortgagee of the property.

In Farmers Bank of Alexandria v. Hooff, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 168 [8: 646], this court dismissed an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, dismissing a bill to have land worth more than $1,000 sold for the payment of a debt of less than $1,000, which was the limit of jurisdiction, Chief Justice Marshall saying: "The real matter in controversy is the debt claimed in the bill; and though the title of the lot may be inquired into incidentally, it does not constitute the object of the suit."

In Ross v. Prentiss, 44 U. S. 3 How. 771 [11: 824], land worth more and mortgaged for more than $2,000 was about to be sold on execution for a debt of a less sum; and a bill by the mortgagée to stay the sale was dismissed. He appealed to this court, and insisted that its jurisdiction depended on the value of the property [30] and the amount of his interest therein, and that he might lose the whole benefit of his mortgage by a forced sale on execution. But the appeal was dismissed, Chief Justice Taney saying. "The only matter in controversy between the parties is the amount claimed on the execution. The dispute is whether the property in question is liable to be charged with it or not. The jurisdiction does not depend on the amount of any contingent loss or damage which one of the parties may sustain by a decision against him, but upon the amount in dispute between them; and as that amount is in this case below $2,000 the appeal must be dismissed."

When a suit is brought by two or more plaintiffs, or against two or more defendants, or to recover or charge property owned or held by different persons (which more often happens under the flexible and comprehensive forms of proceeding in equity and admiralty, than under the stricter rules of the common law), the question, what is the matter in dispute, becomes more difficult. Generally speaking, however, it may be said that the joinder in one suit of several plaintiffs or defendants, who might have sued or been sued in separate actions, does not enlarge the appellate jurisdiction; that when property or money is claimed by several persons suing together, the test is whether they claim it under one common right, the adverse party having no interest in its apportionment or distribution among them, or claim it under separate and distinct rights, each of which is contested by the adverse party; that when two persons are sued, or two parcels of property are sought to be recovered or charged, by one person in one suit, the test is whether the defendant's alleged liability to the plaintiff, or claim to the property is joint or several; and that, so far as affected by any such joinder, the right of appeal is mutual, because the matter in dispute between the parties is that which is asserted on the one side and denied on the other.

In the leading case of Oliver v. Alexander, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 143 [8: 349], upon a libel in admiralty against the owners of a vessel to recover 31] seamen's wages, and an attachment of the proceeds of the vessel in the hands of assignees, the libelants obtained a decree for the payment out of those proceeds to them respectively of sums less than $1,000, but amounting in all to more than $2,000, and the assignees appealed. This court, at January Term, 1832, in a judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Story, dismissed the appeal, for the reasons that the shipping articles constituted a several contract with each seaman to all intents and purposes; that, although the libel was in form joint, the contract with each libelant, as well as the decree in his favor, was in truth several, and none of the others had any interest in that contract or could be aggrieved by that decree; that the matter in dispute between each seaman and the owners, or other respondents, was the sum or value of his own demand, without any reference to the demands of others; that it was very clear, therefore, that no seaman could appeal from the circuit court to this court, unless his claim exceeded $2,000; "And the same rule applies to the owners or other respondents, who are not at liberty to consolidate the distinct demands of each seaman into an aggregate, thus making the claims of the whole the matter in dispute; but they can appeal only in regard to the demand of a seaman which exceeds the sum required by law for that purpose, as a distinct matter in dispute."

Upon like reasons, in Rich v. Lambert, 53 U. S. 12 How. 347 [13: 1017], where a libel by several owners of cargo against the ship to recover damages by improper stowage had been consolidated by order of the court with similar libels by other owners of cargo, and a decree entered awarding to the libelants respectively various sums, some more and some less than $2,000; but amounting in all to more than $10,000, an appeal by the owner of the ship was dismissed as to all the libelants who had recovered less than $2,000 each. Similar decisions were made at October Term, 1882, in two cases of libels to recover damages to ship and cargo by collision, in one of which the appeal was taken by the libelants, and in the other by the owner of the vessel against which the suit was brought. Ex parte Balt. & O. R. R. Co. 106 U. S. 5 [27: 78]; The Nevada, Id. 154 [27: 149]. See also Clifton v. Sheldon, 64 U. S. 23 How. 481 [16: 429]. In the intermediate case of The Rio Grande, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 178 [22: 60], in which materialmen joining in a libel in rem had severally recovered in the circuit court various sums, a motion by them to dismiss the appeal of the owners of the vessel was not sustained, because the motion was "to dismiss the appeal" generally, and not as to those only who had recovered sums insufficient to give this court jurisdiction. [32]

The decisions in cases of salvage illustrate the application of the rule to different states of facts. From a decree on a libel for salvage of a ship and cargo, or of several parcels of goods, belonging to different owners, when the salvage demanded against the whole exceeds the jurisdictional limit, but the amount chargeable on the property of each owner is within it, no appeal lies, either by the salvors or by the owners. Stratton v. Jarvis, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 4 [8: 846]; Spear v. Place, 52 U. S. 11 How. 522 [13: 796]. The reasons for this were summed up by Chief Justice Taney as follows: "The salvage service is entire; but the goods of each owner are liable only for the salvage with which they are charged, and have no common liability for the amounts due from the ship or other portions of the cargo. It is a separate and distinct controversy between himself and the salvors, and not a common and undivided one, for which the property is jointly liable." Shields v. Thomas, 58 U. S. 17 How. 3, 6 [15: 94]. Because the salvage service is entire, and is the common service of all the salvors acting together, and the salvage awarded is for that service, and the matter in dispute is the amount due the salvors collectively, and it is of no consequence to the owner of the property saved how the money recovered is apportioned among those who have earned it, this court has since decided that the owner of the ship may appeal from a decree against the ship for salvage which exceeds the sum of $5,000, although the amount awarded to each salvor is less than that sum. The Connemara, 103 U. S. 754 [26: 322].

Upon like grounds, it was held, in the case of The Mamie, 105 U. S. 773 [26: 937] that from a decree dismissing a petition to obtain the benefit of the Act of Congress limiting the liability of ship owners, the owner of the vessel might appeal, even if the value of the thing surrendered was less than $5,000, when the claims against it were for much more than twice that sum in the 33] aggregate, though for only $5,000 each; because, as explained in Ex parte Balt. & O. R. R. Co. [supra] the matter in dispute was the owner's right to surrender the vessel, and to be discharged from all further liability; and if that right was established, he had nothing to do with the division of the fund thus created among those having claims against it.

To the same class may perhaps be assigned Rodd v. Heartt, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 354 [21: 627], where the appeal, which the court declined to dismiss, was by many creditors, secured by one mortgage for more than $5,000, from a decree in rem, postponing that mortgage to claims of materialmen upon the vessel; but the report, both of the facts and the opinion, is so brief, that it is difficult to ascertain exactly upon what ground the court proceeded.

In equity, as in admiralty, when the sum sued for is one in which the plaintiffs have a joint and common interest, and the defendant has nothing to do with its distribution among them, the whole sum sued for is the test of the jurisdiction.

The earliest case of that class is Shields v. Thomas [supra], in which this court held that an appeal would lie from a decree in equity, ordering a defendant, who had converted to his own use property of an intestate, to pay to the plaintiffs, distributees of the estate, a sum of money exceeding $2,000, and apportioning it among them in shares less than that sum. The case was distinguished from those of Oliver v. Alexander and Rich v. Lambert, above cited, upon the following grounds:

"The matter in controversy," said Chief Justice Taney, "was the sum due to the representatives of the deceased collectively, and not the particular sum to which each was entitled, when the amount due was distributed among them, according to the laws of the State. They all claimed under one and the same title. They had a common and undivided interest in the claim; and it was perfectly immaterial to the appellant how it was to be shared among them. [34] He had no controversy with either of them on that point; and if there was any difficulty as to the proportions in which they were to share, the dispute was among themselves, and not with him.

"It is like a contract with several to pay a sum of money. It may be that the money, when recovered, is to be divided between them in equal or unequal proportions. Yet, if a controversy arises on the contract, and the sum in dispute upon it exceeds $2,000, an appeal would clearly lie to this court, although the interest of each individual was less than that sum."

To the same class belongs Freeman v. Dawson, 110 U. S. 264 [28:141], in which the only matter in dispute was the legal title to the whole of a fund of more than $5,000, as between a judgment creditor and the grantee in a deed of trust; no question arose of payment to or distribution among the cestuis que trust, and this court therefore took jurisdiction of an appeal by the trustee from a decree in favor of the judgment creditor.

In Market Co. v. Hoffman, 101 U. S. 112 [25:782], in which, upon the bill of a number of occupiers of stalls in a market, a perpetual injunction was granted to restrain the market company from selling the stalls by auction, the reason assigned by this court for entertaining the appeal of the company was that "The case is one of two hundred and six complainants suing jointly; the decree is a single one in favor of them all, and in denial of the right claimed by the company, which is of far greater value than the sum which, by the Act of Congress, is the limit below which an appeal is not allowable."

But in equity, as in admiralty, when several persons join in one suit to assert several and distinct interests and those interests alone are in dispute, the amount of the interest of each is the limit of the appellate jurisdiction.

In Seaver v. Bigelow, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 208 [18:595], a bill in equity by two judgment creditors for less than $1,000 each, against their debtor and a person alleged to have fraudulently obtained possession of a fund of more than $2,000 in value, to compel satisfaction of the debts out of that fund, was dismissed, and the plaintiffs appealed. This court dismissed the appeal for lack of jurisdiction, Mr. Justice Nelson saying: "The judgment creditors who have joined in this bill have separate and dis- [35] tinct interests, depending upon separate and distinct judgments. In no event could the sum in dispute of either party exceed the amount of their judgment, which is less than $2,000. The bill being dismissed, each fails in obtaining payment of his demands. If it had been sustained, and a decree rendered in their favor, it would only have been for the amount of the judgment of each." "It is true, the litigation involves a common fund, which exceeds the sum of $2,000, but neither of the judgment creditors has any interest in it exceeding the amount of his judgment. Hence, to sustain an appeal in this class of cases, where separate and distinct interests are in dispute, of an amount less than the statute requires, and where the joinder of parties is permitted by the mere indulgence of the court, for its convenience, and to save expense, would be giving a privilege to the parties not common to other litigants, and which is forbidden by law."

In that case, indeed, the whole amount of both debts did not exceed $2,000. But the opinion, as appears by the reasoning above quoted, and by the reference in it to Oliver v. Alexander and Rich v. Lambert, above cited, was evidently framed to cover two other cases, argued and decided contemporaneously with Seaver v. Bigelow, which do not appear in the official reports, except in this brief note: "Similar decree made for the same reason in the case of Field v. Bigelow, and in one branch of Myers v. Fenn." 5 Wall. 211 [18:596], note. The opinions of Mr. Justice Nelson in those two cases, remaining on file, and published in the edition of the Lawyers' Coöperative Publishing Company (Bk. 18, p. 604), show the following facts: In Field v. Bigelow, the whole amount of debts sued for was more, although each debt was less than $2,000, and Mr. Justice Nelson said: "No one of the three separate and distinct classes of creditors held a judgment exceeding $2,000. Neither judgment creditor, therefore, is entitled to an appeal to this court within the statute, as decided in the case of Seaver v. Bigelow." In Myers v. Fenn, the appeal was dismissed, on the authority of Seaver v. Bigelow, as to creditors whose claims were severally less, but not as to those whose claims were severally more, than that sum.

So in Russell v. Stansell, 105 U. S. 303 [26: [36] 989], where all the lands within a particular district were assessed to pay a decree against the levee board of the district, and the amount assessed to each owner was less than $5,000, and a bill filed by them jointly for an injunction against the collection of the assessment was dismissed, it was held that they could not appeal, because, as observed by the Chief Justice, "Their object was to relieve each separate owner from the amount for which he personally, or his property, was found to be accountable;" and "Although the amount due the appellee from the levee district exceeds $5,000, his claim on the several owners of property is only for the sum assessed against them respectively." See also Chatfield v. Boyle, 105 U. S. 231 [26; 944]; Adams v. Crittenden, 106 U. S. 576 [27: 99].

The same rule has been applied in many recent cases where the appeal has been taken by the party who had been ordered by the decree below to pay several distinct claims amounting together to more than $5,000.

In Schwed v. Smith, 106 U. S. 188 [27:156], property worth more than $5,000 having been taken on execution upon a judgment confessed by the owners in favor of one Heller for more than $5,000, subsequent attaching creditors, whose claims were jointly more, but severally less, than that sum, filed a bill in equity against the debtors, Heller and the sheriff, and obtained a decree declaring Heller's judgment void as against the plaintiffs. An appeal by the defendants was dismissed on motion, for want of jurisdiction, the Chief Justice saying: "It is impossible to distinguish this case in principle from Seaver v. Bigelow [supra]." "If the decree is several as to the creditors, it is difficult to see why it is not as to their adversaries. The theory is that although the proceeding is in form but one suit, its legal effect is the same as though separate suits had been begun on each of the separate causes of action." "Although the effect of the decree is to deprive Heller in the aggregate of more than $5,000, it has been done at the suit of several parties on several claims, who might have sued separately, but whose suits have been joined in one for convenience and to save expense."

[37] In Farmers Loan & T. Co. v. Waterman, 106 U. S. 265 [27:115], the purchasers of a railroad subject to the debts of intervening petitioners appealed from a decree ordering them to pay various sums to the petitioners respectively, amounting in all to more than $5,000, and the appeal was dismissed as to those petitioners whose debts were severally less than that sum. And in Hassall v. Wilcox, 115 U. S. 598 [29:504], a similar decision was made upon an appeal by the trustee in a railroad mortgage from a decree in favor of several creditors claiming prior liens.

In Fourth Nat. Bank v. Stout, 113 U. S. 684 [28:1152], the court dismissed the appeal of a bank from a decree adjudging that it held property of another corporation in trust for the creditors of the latter (one of whom had filed the bill, and the others had intervened by leave of court pending the suit), and directing the bank to pay to the creditors severally sums of less than $5,000, amounting in all to more than $5,000.

In Stewart v. Dunham, 115 U. S. 61 [29:329], upon a bill in equity in behalf of judgment creditors (including some who came in pending the suit), against their debtor and one to whom he had made a conveyance of property alleged to be fraudulent and void as against his creditors, by the decree below, the conveyance was adjudged to have been made to hinder, delay and defraud creditors, with the knowledge and connivance of the grantee, and was canceled, set aside, and declared to be null and void; and the defendants were ordered to pay out of the property to the plaintiffs respectively various sums, one of which was more and the others less than $5,000; and the defendants took an appeal, which was dismissed as to all the creditors except the one to whom more than $5,000 had been awarded.

Upon the same principle, neither party can appeal from a decree upon a bill by a single plaintiff to enforce separate and distinct liabilities against several defendants, if the sum for which each is alleged or found to be liable is less than the jurisdictional amount. For instance, it was decided in Paving Co. v. Mulford, 100 U. S. 147 [25:591], that the plaintiff could not appeal from the dismissal of a bill to assert a right against two defendants in two distinct certificates of indebtedness, held by them severally, for sums severally less, though together more, than that amount; and in Ex parte Phœnix Ins. Co. 117 U. S. 367 [29:923], that four insurance companies could not appeal from a decree that each of them should pay $3,000 to the plaintiff. [38]

In the less frequent instances in which similar questions have arisen in proceedings at common law, the same distinctions have been maintained.

Where a writ of mandamus was issued to compel a county clerk to extend upon a tax collector's books a sum sufficient to pay several distinct judgments held by different persons, it was held that the case was like Seaver v. Bigelow and Schwed v. Smith, above cited, and the defendant's right of appeal was determined by the amount of each judgment. Hawley v. Fairbanks, 108 U. S. 543 [27:820]. But where the writ commanded a collector to collect a tax of 1 per cent upon the property of a county, which had already been levied for the joint benefit of all the relators, it was held that the case was like Shields v. Thomas and The Connemara, above cited, and that the right of appeal depended upon the whole amount of the tax. Davies v. Corbin, 112 U. S. 36 [28:627].

In ejectment against two defendants for two parcels of land, if each defendant claims only one parcel, the value of each parcel is the limit of appellate jurisdiction. Tupper v. Wise, 110 U. S. 398 [28:189]; Lynch v. Bailey, 110 U. S. 400 [28:190]. But if both defendants jointly claim both parcels, the value of both is the test. Friend v. Wise, 111 U. S. 797 [28:602].

In Henderson v. Wadsworth, 115 U. S. 264, 276 [29:377, 379], where, in an action against heirs upon a debt of their ancestor, separate judgments were rendered against them for their proportionate shares, it was held that no one who had been thus charged with less than $5,000 could appeal; and Mr. Justice Woods, in delivering judgment, referred to many of the cases above cited, and declared it to be well settled that "Where a judgment or decree against a defendant, who pleads no counterclaim or set-off, and asks no affirmative relief, is brought by him to this court by writ of error or appeal, the amount in dispute on which the jurisdiction depends is the amount of the judgment or decree which is sought to be reversed;" and that [39] "Neither codefendants nor coplaintiffs can unite their separate and distinct interests for the purpose of making up the amount necessary to give this court jurisdiction upon writ of error or appeal."

The true line of distinction, as applied to cases like that now before us, is sharply brought out by the recent decisions of Stewart v. Dunham [supra], and Estes v. Gunter, 121 U. S. 183 [ante, 884], in each of which a preferred creditor for more than $5,000 was on one side, and general creditors for less than $5,000 each were on the other. In Stewart v. Dunham, the suit being brought by the general creditors against the debtor and the preferred creditor to whom the debtor had made the conveyance alleged to be fraudulent, and the latter seeking no affirmative relief, the matter in dispute as between the defendants and each of the plaintiffs was the amount of the claim of that plaintiff; but in Estes v. Gunter, the suit being brought by the preferred creditor against the trustee in the deed of assignment by which he was preferred, and the general creditors being summoned in as defendants, and themselves asking no affirmative relief, the matter in dispute was the value of the debt preferred and the property assigned to secure the preference.

The case at bar is exactly like Stewart v. Dunham. The suit is by the general creditors, only one of whose debts amounts to $5,000; the trustee and the preferred creditor appear as defendants only, file no cross-bill, and ask no affirmative relief; and the decree sets aside the fraudulent conveyance so far only as it affects the plaintiffs' rights. The sole matter in dispute, therefore, is between the defendants and each plaintiff as to the amount which the latter shall recover; and the motion to dismiss the appeal of the defendants as to all the plaintiffs except the one whose debt exceeds $5,000 must be granted.

This result, as we have seen, is in accordance with a long series of decisions of this court, extending over more than half a century. During that period Congress has often legislated on the subject of our appellate jurisdiction, without changing the phraseology which had received judicial construction. The court should not now unsettle a rule so long established and recognized.

[154] CHAUNCEY P. WILLIAMS, Plff. in Err.,

v.

BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF THE COUNTY OF ALBANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 154-166.)

National banks—state taxation of shares—assessment at par value—assessments, void for want of conformity to state laws—subsequent enactment to legalize and confirm, valid.

1. The valuation of national bank shares in common with those of state banks at par, although the actual value of the shares differ, is not a violation of the Act of Congress which prohibits the assessment by the States of national bank shares higher in proportion than other moneyed capital.

2. The mode in which property shall be appraised for taxation, by whom its appraisement shall be made, the time within which it shall be done, what certificate of official action shall be furnished, and when parties shall be heard for the correction of errors, are matters resting in the discretion of the Legislature. Where directions upon the subject might originally have been dispensed with, or executed at another time, irregularities arising from neglect to follow them may be remedied by the Legislature, unless its action in this respect is restrained by constitutional provisions prohibiting retrospective legislation.

3. In the case presented, it is held that certain assessments, which were invalid for want of conformity to the laws of the State of New York, were duly legalized and confirmed by a subsequent legislative enactment.

Argued March 16, 1887. Decided May 23, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York. Reported below, 22 Blatchf. 302. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Compare the case of Stanley v. Board of Supervisors, ante, 1000.

Mr. Matthew Hale, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Wheeler H. Peckham and Simon W. Rosendale, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court: [155]

This is an action to recover the amount of certain taxes alleged to have been illegally collected from the plaintiff and others on sundry shares of stock held by them in the National Albany Exchange Bank, in the City of Albany, New York, and paid into the treasury of the County. The stockholders other than the plaintiff assigned to him their respective claims before its commencement. Their demands were originally embraced in an action brought by one Edward N. Stanley against the Board of Supervisors, he being at the time assignee of their claims. In that action judgment was recovered by him. The case being brought to this court, the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded with leave to the court below, in its discretion, to hear evidence upon the point whether the shares were habitually and intentionally assessed higher in proportion to their actual value than other moneyed capital generally, and, if necessary, to allow an amendment of the pleadings that the point might be properly presented. Supervisors v. Stanley, 105 U. S. 305 [26: 1044]. When the case was remanded, on application to the court below, all the counts of the complaint, except the fourth, were amended. Subsequently, however, Stanley discontinued the action as to the claim for the taxes assessed and collected for the years 1876, 1877 and 1878. The plaintiff then took an assignment of the claim for those taxes from Stanley and commenced the present action. He contends that the assessment for those years upon the shares of the stock of the bank was illegal on these grounds:

1. Because it was not made within the period required by law, which was before the first of September of each year, but after that date.

2. Because it was not accompanied by the oath of the assessors, that it had been made at the full and true value of the shares, subject only to certain specified deductions allowed by law.

3. Because it was higher, in proportion to the actual value of the shares, than the assessment of other moneyed capital in the hands of [156] individual citizens of the State was to its actual value.

The defendant answered these grounds by a general denial, and by setting up an Act of the Legislature of New York, passed April 30, 1883, legalizing and confirming the assessment.

The issues were tried by the court without [157] the intervention of a jury, by consent of parties. The court found the facts as admitted by the pleadings and by stipulation of the parties, from which it appeared, among other things, that no entry of any assessment of the shares of the stockholders of the bank was made upon the assessment roll of 1876, 1877, and 1878, until after the first day of September of those years, and after the time provided by law for revising and correcting the assessment; that the oath of the assessors, annexed to the assessment of each year, was defective in its averment respecting the estimated value of the real estate assessed, but was correct in its averment of the estimated value of the personal property; that there were several banks, state and national, located in the City of Albany, and that the actual value of their shares during those years, with one exception, was above par, varying in that respect from 10 to over 100 per cent, and yet the value of all of them was assessed at par; that the actual value of shares in the National Albany Exchange Bank was from 25 to 30 per cent above par; that the assessment of the shares of some of the other banks was higher and of some of them lower than this figure; and that the assessment
[158] at par was not made by the assessors with the intent of discriminating against the holders of national bank shares, or in favor of the holders of state bank shares, or other moneyed capital. As a conclusion of law, the court found that the assessments were illegal because not made in conformity with the laws of the State, but that they were legalized and confirmed by the Act of its Legislature of April 30, 1883, and that they were not in violation of any law of the United States. 22 Blatchf. 302. Judgment was accordingly rendered for the defendant, and the plaintiff has brought the case here for review.

It may be conceded that the assessment of the shares of the National Albany Exchange Bank was in some instances higher in proportion to their actual value than the assessment of some other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens was to its actual value; but, as seen from the findings, such discrimination was not designed by the assessors. It is so stipulated by the parties. Whatever discrimination in such instances may have existed arose from the difficulty of devising any other mode than the one adopted, which would work out greater equality and uniformity in the valuation of different kinds of moneyed capital. There was no proof as to the assessment of any moneyed capital, except shares of other banks, state or national. The value of shares in some of these banks was higher, in some lower, than [163] that of the shares of the National Albany Exchange Bank. The method adopted of assessing all shares at par was generally satisfactory to the owners of the national bank stock in the City of Albany, with the exception of a few stockholders in the National Albany Exchange Bank. Considering the nature of the property, and the frequent fluctuations in value to which it is subject, the method applied to all banks, state and national, came, as we said in the recent case of Stanley against the same defendants, as nearly as practicable to securing between them equality and uniformity of taxation. All the banks, state and national, being thus placed, as respects taxation, upon the same footing, the method could not be considered as adopted in hostility to any of them. If it sometimes led to undervaluation of the shares of national banks, the holders could not complain. If it sometimes led to overvaluation of the shares, the aggrieved party could obtain relief by pursuing the course pointed out by the statute for its correction, unless, as asserted, this course was not, in the years mentioned, available to the plaintiff and the stockholders whose interests were assigned to him, because their names were not placed on the assessment roll until the time provided by law for revising and correcting the assessment had passed. If that course was thus cut off, they could have resorted to a court of equity to enjoin the collection of the illegal excess upon payment or tender of the amount due upon what they admitted to be a just valuation. We have considered this subject so fully in the recent case of Stanley against these same defendants, to which we refer, that it is unnecessary to pursue it further.

The irregularities in the assessment for the years 1876, 1877 and 1878, in that no entry of any assessment of the shares of the plaintiff and of the stockholders whose claims were assigned to him was made on the assessment roll of those years until after the first of September, and after the time for revising and correcting the assessment had passed, and in the defect of the oath annexed, in its averment as to the estimate of the value of real estate, were, in our judgment, cured by the validating Act of April 30, 1883. The power of taxation vested [164] in the Legislature is, with some exceptions, limited only by constitutional provisions designed to secure equality and uniformity in the assessment. The mode in which the property shall be appraised, by whom its appraisement shall be made, the time within which it shall be done, what certificate of their action shall be furnished, and when parties shall be heard for the correction of errors, are matters resting in its discretion. Where directions upon the subject might originally have been dispensed with, or executed at another time, irregularities arising from neglect to follow them may be remedied by the Legislature, unless its action in this respect is restrained by constitutional provisions prohibiting retrospective legislation It is only necessary, therefore, in any case to consider whether the assessment could have been ordered originally without requiring the proceedings, the omission or defective performance of which is complained of, or without requiring them within the time designated. If they were not essential to any valid assessment, and therefore might have been omitted or performed at another time, their omission or defective performance may be cured by the same authority which directed them; provided, always, that intervening rights are not impaired. Such is the conclusion of numerous adjudications by the state courts upon the effect of curative Acts, and of this court in Mattingly v. Dist. of Columbia, 97 U. S. 687, 690 [24: 1098, 1100]; Hart v. Henderson, 17 Mich. 218; Muselman v. Logansport, 29 Ind. 533; Grim v. Weissenberg School Dist. 57 Pa. 433. The completion of the assessment roll in the case at bar before the first of September in the years mentioned, and the form of the oath annexed, were not so vital to the assessment itself as necessarily to render the defect arising from a later return or a deficient oath incurable. The completion of the assessment roll by that date was deemed essential by the court below, because the law required the assessors forthwith to cause notices to be published in three of the public newspapers of the city for twenty days, specifying a day at their expiration when they would meet and remain in session five days for the purpose of reviewing their assessments on the application of any one aggrieved. The requirement was designed to afford taxpayers [165] whose names were on the roll an opportunity for the examination and correction of the assessment of their property. The assessment could not stand if they were deprived of that opportunity. But it is not perceived why it might not be legalized and confirmed by the Legislature giving to them such opportunity after the time originally designated had expired. No just right of the taxpayer would thereby be defeated.

The assessment of the shares of the bank for the years 1876, 1877 and 1878 was held invalid for the reason stated, under the laws of the State, although from what we have said it would not be open to objection as being in conflict with the Act of Congress. It is only in view of its invalidity for want of conformity to the laws of the State that the validating Act becomes of importance. That Act declares that the assessments contained in the assessment rolls of the wards of the city for the above years are "In all things legalized and confirmed, subject to the rights of the shareholders or their personal representatives, in national or state banks which were located in said city, during those years, and the assessments against whom by reason of their ownership of such shares were collected by process of law, to claim a deduction from or cancellation of such assessments." It required the assessors, within ten days after the passage of the Act, to publish in the official papers of the city daily for three weeks, Sundays and holidays excepted, a notice to the stockholders that the assessors would be in attendance at their office in Albany, for three weeks subsequent to the last day of publication of the notice, and hear applications for the deduction from the assessments of any amount which such stockholders or their personal representatives would have been entitled to deduct under the law as it existed in the year when the assessment was placed on the roll, had such application then been made. And the Act provided that such shareholders, or any one representing them, might appear before the assessors and apply [166] for a reduction or cancellation of the assessment upon any ground which would have been a legal one when the assessment was placed on the roll, and the assessors were empowered to grant such reduction or cancellation as the shareholders would have been legally entitled to at that time. The Act also made provision for the collection and payment to the parties of the amount found to be due them with interest.

It is difficult to see on what plausible ground the validity of this Act can be questioned, unless the power of the Legislature to cure by legislative Act any irregularities of the assessment be denied. Every right of the shareholder who had paid taxes on the assessment, and it does not appear that there were any others, was secured. He could present any claim he might have for a reduction or cancellation of the assessment, and be heard respecting it. He occupied the same position he would have held, if the assessment of his shares had been placed on the assessment roll within the time required —that is, before the first of September—and the oath annexed had been without any fault or omission in its averments. The plaintiff and the other shareholders were bound, as owners of property, to bear their just proportion of the public burdens; and if, in ascertaining what that proportion should be, some steps in the proceeding were omitted which invalidated the assessment, it would seem but just that the defect should be cured, if practicable, and the shareholders not be allowed to escape taxation and thus entail the burden they should bear upon other taxpayers of the community.

After the validating Act was passed, the plaintiff applied to the assessors for the cancellation of the assessment for the years 1876, 1877 and 1878, or a reduction from the amount assessed. The assessors refused to cancel the assessments, but they allowed a reduction from them to the amount of $2,071.66 which was paid to him.

It follows from the views expressed that the judgment of the Circuit Court must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

ERWIN DAVIS, Plff. in Err., [138]
v.
ALGERNON S. PATRICK.

Contract to secure advances made and to be made to mining company—construction of—person secured, not a partner and not liable for debts incurred in operating the mine—manager—agency—erroneous instruction—practice—bill of exceptions—delay—stipulation.

1. In an action to recover compensation for transporting ore from a certain silver mine in Utah, it is held: that an agreement between the defendant and the mining company, to secure the former for advances made and to be made, whereby a manager was appointed to operate and control the mine, to pay over to the defendant the profits thereof and to deliver to him a certain quantity of ore which he had purchased, the defendant having the power to remove said manager and appoint a new one in his stead, did not make him a partner with the company, or with the manager, or make the manager his agent in managing the mine, so as to make him responsible for any contract entered into by the manager; and that certain instructions which left the jury to determine the legal effect of the contract and a power of attorney to the manager from the company, and which assumed that the defendant may have owned the ore transported, the evidence failing to show any such ownership, were erroneous.

2. Where the parties stipulate that the judge may delay the settlement and signature of the bill of exceptions, this court will not consider an objection that it was signed after the beginning of the term at which the writ of error was made returnable, and during a term of the circuit court succeeding that at which the case was tried, although the delay extended beyond the time made in the stipulation.

Argued April 14, 1887. Decided May 23, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska. Reversed, Remanded.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. M. Woolworth, Joseph H. Choate, Henry A. Root and J. M. Thurston, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. John L. Webster, John F. Dillon, A. J. Poppleton and Geo. W. Doane, for defendant in error:

To make J. N. H. Patrick the agent or servant of the Flagstaff Company, the company must have more than the mere right of selection. It must have had the right of control over J. N. H. Patrick, which it did not have under the contract, having by that instrument expressly surrendered it.

Something more than the mere right of selection on the part of the principal is essential to that relation.

Boswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 469.

The liability of a principal is based upon the power to control the agent or servant, or to discharge him for misconduct.

Ohio R. R. Co. v. Davis, 23 Ind. 556; Maxmilian v. Mayor of N. Y. 62 N. Y. 168; Ham v. Mayor of N. Y. 70 N. Y. 462.

The rule of respondeat superior is based upon the right which the employer has to select his servants, to discharge them if not competent or skillful or well behaved, and to direct or control them while in his employ.

Maxmilian v. Mayor of N. Y. 62 N. Y. 168.

The application of the rule referred to in this case depends upon the question whether the power to discharge, direct and control existed, and is the main point which is now to be determined.

Ham v. Mayor of N. Y. 70 N. Y. 462.

By the contract J. N. H. Patrick did not receive his appointment from the company alone. It is apparent that his appointment was dictated by Davis, and for his primary benefit, and both unite in the contract as parties to it. If, however, J. N. H. Patrick had been appointed by the Flagstaff Company only, still that fact would not make him the agent of the company.

Buttrick v. City of Lowell, 1 Allen, 172; Walcott v. Swampscott, 1 Allen, 101; Barney v. City of Lowell, 98 Mass. 570; Wheeler v. Cincinnati, 19 Ohio St. 19; Maxmilian v. Mayor of N. Y. 62 N. Y. 164.

Even if it had been provided that the Flagstaff Company should pay the salary of Patrick, it would not make him the agent of the company.

Hafford v. New Bedford, 16 Gray, 297; Fisher v. Boston, 104 Mass. 87; Barnes v. District of Columbia, 91 U. S. 546 (23: 441).

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law brought in a court of the State of Nebraska, on the 24th of November, 1880, and removed, on the petition of the defendant, into the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska, by Algernon S. Patrick against Erwin Davis, to recover certain sums of money. [139]

There are two causes of action set forth in the petition by which the suit was commenced. Under the first one, the plaintiff claims to recover $2,677.90, with interest from September 3, 1877, and $8,806.92, with interest from February 7, 1877. No question arises here as to the first cause of action. The second cause of action alleged in the petition is that, on or about the 15th of November, 1878, the plaintiff was employed by the defendant to transport silver ore from the Flagstaff mine, in Utah Territory, to the furnaces at Sandy, in that Territory, for a certain hire and reward then agreed upon therefor between the parties; that the plaintiff continued in that employment until on or about the 20th of November, 1875, at which date the account of services was settled and stated from the books of the defendant, and there was then found to be due to the plaintiff $26,589.54; and judgment is prayed for that sum, with interest from November 20, 1875. The answer of the defendant to the second cause of action is a general denial. At the trial before a jury, there was a verdict for the plaintiff, on the 20th of June, 1883, for $50,015.72, and a judgment accordingly, to review which the defendant has brought a writ of error. [140]

The plaintiff moves to strike the bill of exceptions from the record, for the reason that it was not allowed and signed in proper time. On the day the judgment was entered, June 25, 1883, a written stipulation between the parties was filed, providing that the defendant should have forty days to prepare and present to the court his bill of exceptions, and that the plaintiff should have twenty days thereafter to examine the same and make any suggestions of omission, addition or correction thereto, etc. On the 16th of August, 1883, the writ of error was allowed and filed, a supersedeas bond, duly approved, was filed, and a citation was duly issued, the writ of error being returnable at October Term, 1883. On the 14th of September, 1883, the following written stipulation, entitled in the cause, was made between the parties. "The bill of exceptions in this case having been partially settled by His Honor, Judge Dundy, and he desiring to be absent from the district for a month or more, and being unable to settle the remainder of the bill before leaving, it is hereby stipulated that the same may be settled and signed at any time before November 1, 1883, and that the record may be filed in the supreme court by the first of December, 1883, with the same effect as if filed at the beginning of the October Term." The term of the court at which the trial was had and the judgment rendered adjourned sine die on the 20th of October, 1883. The succeeding term of the court began on the 12th of November, 1883. The bill of exceptions was allowed and signed by the judge on the 8th of December, 1883, and was filed on the same day. The record was filed in this court on the 26th of December, 1883. [143]

tions was signed after the beginning of the term of this court at which the writ of error was made returnable, and during a term of the circuit court succeeding that at which the case was tried, it cannot be considered. But we are of opinion that this objection cannot avail. The stipulation of September 14, 1883, shows on its face that the matter of the settlement of the bill of exceptions had been submitted to the judge, and that the delay was agreed to for the convenience of the judge. The purport of the stipulation is that the bill had, with the knowledge of the plaintiff, been tendered to the judge for signature. This being so, the consent of the parties that the judge might delay the settlement and signature did not have the effect to cause any more delay than would have occurred if the judge had delayed the matter without such consent. The defendant was not to blame for the delay beyond the time named in the stipulation. He appears to have done all he could to procure the settlement of and signature to the bill, and he cannot be prejudiced by the delay of the judge. The bill of exceptions shows on its face that the several exceptions taken by the defendant were taken and allowed at the trial and before the verdict. The cases cited by the plaintiff—Walton v. U. S. 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 651 [6:182]; Ex parte Bradstreet v. Thomas, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 102 [7:796]; Sheppard v. Wilson, 47 U.S. 6 How. 260, 275 [12: 430, 436]; Muller v. Ehlers, 91 U.S. 249 [23:319]; and Coughlin v. Dist. of Columbia, 106 U. S. 7 [27:74]—do not contain anything in conflict with this ruling. It is supported by U. S. v. Breitling, 61 U. S. 20 How. 252 [15:900]. The motion to strike out the bill of exceptions is therefore denied.

The claim of the plaintiff is that he was employed, not by the defendant personally, but by the plaintiff's brother, M. T. Patrick. The defendant, not disputing the rendering of the services or their value, denies that they were rendered for him, and denies that M. T. Patrick was his agent. He contends that the services were rendered to the Flagstaff Silver Mining Company of Utah, Limited, an English corporation; that M. T. Patrick was the agent of that company; and that, as such, he employed the plaintiff. The question of this agency was the principal question in dispute at the trial.

[144] The Flagstaff mine was owned in 1870 by certain parties in Utah Territory, who sold it, through the defendant, to the Flagstaff Silver Mining Company. That company continued to own and operate the mine until December, 1873, when J. N. H. Patrick, another brother of the plaintiff, went from New York to London, the defendant being then in London. On the day that J. N. H. Patrick arrived in London the company received a telegram from one Maxwell, superintendent of its mine in Utah, stating that the mine was attached for debt. It applied to the defendant for a loan of money, whereupon the following written agreement was made between the company and the defendant, on the 16th of December, 1873:

"This agreement, made this 16th day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, between the Flagstaff Silver Mining Company of Utah, Limited, of the one part, and Erwin Davis, now of the City of London, of the other part.

"Whereas, the said Erwin Davis, on the 12th of June, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, advanced the said company the sum of five thousand pounds, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum interest:

"And whereas, the said sum of five thousand pounds is now due and owing to said Erwin Davis, with the interest thereon:

"And whereas, it is necessary that the said company should have a further advance of money for the purpose of continuing the development of their mine, and for carrying on their business:

"And whereas, the said Erwin Davis doth hereby agree to advance to said company at such time or times as may be necessary for the purpose aforesaid, not to exceed in amount the sum of ten thousand pounds, in addition to the said sum of five thousand pounds already advanced:

"And whereas, the said company has, at different times and dates, sold to the said Erwin Davis five thousand one hundred and ninety-five tons of ore, which said ore the said company agreed to deliver to the said Erwin Davis at the ore house of said company, free of cost:

"And whereas, they have so delivered two [145] hundred tons of said ore, leaving a balance of four thousand nine hundred and ninety-five tons yet undelivered, the cost of said ore having all been paid to said company by said Erwin Davis:

"Now, therefore, it is agreed between the parties hereto, in consideration of the said sum of money now due and owing to said Erwin Davis by the said company, and the further advances to be made by the said Erwin Davis, as herein agreed, and in further consideration of the premises heretofore stated, J. N. H. Patrick, of Salt Lake, is appointed manager of all the property of said company in Utah, and the said J. N. H. Patrick, as said manager, by himself or his agents, is to have the exclusive, sole, and irrevocable (except as hereinafter mentioned) management of all the said company's properties in Utah, and of all the business in Utah of the said company in mining and smelting silver and other ores, and any and all other lawful business, and, as such manager aforesaid of the business and properties aforesaid, he is hereby authorized and empowered to do, execute, and perform any and all acts, deeds, matters, or things whatsoever, which ought to be done, executed, and performed, or which, in the opinion of the said J. N. H. Patrick, ought to be done, executed or performed, in or about the concerns, engagements, or business of the said company, of every nature and kind whatsoever, as fully and effectually as it could do if the said company were actually present, hereby ratifying and confirming whatsoever the said J. N. H. Patrick may do in and about the company's concerns and business; and it is hereby further agreed that the said J. N. H. Patrick, or his agents, in furtherance of the purposes aforesaid, is to enter into the possession of all the said company's properties in Utah necessary for conducting the business and management thereof as aforesaid, until such time as, out of the profits of the workings of the properties aforesaid, he, the said J. N. H. Patrick, has repaid to Erwin Davis the said sum of five thousand pounds, with the interest thereon, and also has repaid to him all and every sums of money he may have advanced to the said company under this agreement, together with interest thereon at the rate of six pounds per [146] centum per annum, and also until he has mined and delivered to Erwin Davis all the ores sold him by said company, as per agreement herein stated, and also until he has smelted the ore so mined and delivered to him, in the said company's furnaces, according to the terms and agreement dated the 12th day of September last, made between the said company and Erwin Davis; and when he, the said J. N. H. Patrick, has so paid to him all the moneys so advanced said company and interest as aforesaid, mined and delivered the ores so sold and contracted, and smelted said ores, and done and performed all the agreements herein contained, then the said J. N. H. Patrick may resign the management aforesaid, and shall, upon being called upon so to do, deliver to said company all of said properties in as good condition as possible after the necessary workings, mining, and smelting, as herein agreed to be done and performed. And it is hereby further agreed that the said mine is to be worked and mined by the said J. N. H. Patrick in a proper and minerlike manner, and that the said business of said company is to be managed with economy and for the best interests of the parties hereto; that a statement of all the business transactions, with accounts of the same, showing all moneys received and the source from whence so received, and all moneys paid out, with the proper vouchers therefor, is to be made monthly to said company, at their office at the City of London, by the said J. N. H. Patrick. And it is hereby further agreed that nothing herein contained shall be construed to defeat or impair any legal rights the said Erwin Davis may have for the moneys now due said Erwin Davis, or so to be advanced by said Erwin Davis, or for the delivery of the ores so sold said Erwin Davis. And it is hereby further agreed, between the parties hereto, that if, at any time, the said Erwin Davis becomes dissatisfied with the management of the business and the property in Utah, he may suspend and remove the manager and appoint another manager in his place, with any or all rights, powers, or authority delegated under this agreement; and, should the said Erwin Davis proceed to act upon the powers contained in the last preceding clause, he will consult with the board of directors of the said company, as to the new manager from time to time to be appointed.

At the same time, and as a part of the same arrangement, the company, on the 16th of December, 1878, executed to J. N. H. Patrick the following power of attorney:

"Know all men by these presents, That we The Flagstaff Silver Mining Company, do hereby constitute and appoint John Nelson Hays Patrick, of Salt Lake City, Utah, in the United States of America, their true and lawful attorney, to take possession of and carry on and manage the workings of the mine or mines belonging to the said company, and for that purpose to appoint officers, clerks, workmen and others, and to remove them and appoint others in their place, and to pay and allow to the persons to be so employed such salaries, wages or other remuneration as he shall think fit; also, to ask, demand, sue for, recover and receive of and from all persons and bodies politic or corporate, to pay, transfer and deliver the same, respectively, all sums of money, stocks, funds, interest, dividends, debts, dues, effects and things now owing or payable to the said company, or which shall at any time or times hereafter be owing or belong to the said company, by virtue of any security or upon any balance of accounts or otherwise howsoever, or of any part thereof, respectively; to give, sign and execute receipts, releases, and other discharges for the same, respectively; and on nonpayment, nontransfer or nondelivery thereof, or of any part thereof, respectively; to commence, carry on and prosecute any action, suit or other proceeding whatsoever for recovering and compelling the payment, transfer or delivery thereof, respectively, also, to settle, adjust, compound, submit to arbitration and compromise [148] all actions, suits, accounts, reckonings, claims, and demands whatsoever which now are or hereafter shall or may be pending between the said company and any person or persons whomsoever, in such manner and in all respects as the said John Nelson Hays Patrick shall think fit; also, to sell and convert into money any goods, effects or things which now belong or at any time or times hereafter shall belong to said company; and also to enter into, make, sign, seal, execute and deliver, acknowledge and perform any contract, agreement, writing or thing that may, in the opinion of him, the said John Nelson Hays Patrick, be necessary or proper to be entered into, made or signed, sealed, executed, delivered, acknowledged or performed for effectuating the purposes aforesaid, or any of them; and, for all or any of the purposes of these presents, to use the name of the said company, and generally to do, execute and perform any other act, deed, matter or thing whatsoever which ought to be done, executed or performed, or which, in the opinion of the said John Nelson Hays Patrick, ought to be done, executed or performed, in or about the concerns, engagements and business of the said company, of every nature and kind whatsoever, as fully and effectually as it could do if the said company were actually present; and the said company do hereby agree to ratify and confirm all and whatsoever the said John Nelson Hays Patrick shall lawfully do or cause to be done in or about the premises, by virtue of these presents.

"Witness:

"E. JOHNSON,

6 & 6 Gt. Winchester St., London."

J. N. H. Patrick testifies that, in consequence of the arrangement made between the company and the defendant, though prior to the actual execution of the papers of the 16th of [149] December, 1873, he, J. N. H. Patrick, telegraphed from London to M. T. Patrick, in the United States, instructions to take charge of the mine, directing him to stave off all debts he could, and saying that money would be forwarded to him to keep the mine running, and that full instructions had been written to him; and that the company telegraphed to Maxwell to turn the mine over to M. T. Patrick. J. N. H. Patrick testifies that the defendant did not send any such telegram to M. T. Patrick.

On the other hand, M. T. Patrick testifies that he received a telegram from London with the name of the defendant signed to it, instructing him to go to Utah and take charge of the mine; that that was the authority upon which he did so; that he received possession of the mine from Maxwell; and that he employed the plaintiff to do the hauling of the ore.

J. N. H. Patrick testifies that, when the news of the financial difficulties of the company arrived in London, and the company applied to the defendant for a further loan of money, he refused to make it unless the company would give him the management of the mine; and that the company declined to do so, but agreed to make the arrangement evidenced by the papers of December 16, 1873.

The purport and bearing of these papers is very plain, on their face. The company owed the defendant £5,000, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, for that amount advanced by him to it on the 12th of June, 1873. A further advance of money was necessary to enable it to carry on its business. The defendant agrees to advance to it not to exceed £10,000, in addition to the £5,000 already advanced. It had previously sold to him a quantity of ore, which it had agreed to deliver to him at its ore house, free of cost, the cost of it having all been paid to the company by the defendant, and a balance of 4,995 tons being yet undelivered. In consideration of the premises, the company appoints J. N. H. Patrick manager of all its property in Utah, he, by himself or his agents, to have the exclusive and irrevocable management, except as thereinafter mentioned, of all its properties in Utah, and of all its mining and smelting business there. He [150] is to conduct and manage the above business until such time as, out of the profits of the working of the properties, he has repaid to the defendant the £5,000 and interest, and also all moneys the defendant may advance to the company under the agreement, with interest, and also, until he has mined and delivered to the defendant all the ore so sold to him by the company as stated in the agreement, and also until he has smelted in the furnaces of the company the ore so to be mined and delivered to the defendant, according to the terms and agreement of September 12, 1873, made between the company and the defendant. When all this is done, J. N. H. Patrick may resign the management. He is to work the mine in a proper manner, and manage the business of the company with economy, and for the best interests of the parties to the agreement, and is to render a monthly statement, with vouchers, to the company at London. If, at any time, the defendant becomes dissatisfied with the management of the business and the property in Utah, he may suspend and remove the manager and appoint another manager in his place, with any or all rights, powers or authority delegated under the agreement; and should the defendant proceed to act upon such power of suspension and removal, he is to consult with the board of directors of the company as to the new manager to be appointed. The power of attorney from the company to J. N. H. Patrick appoints him to be the attorney of the company to take possession of and carry on the mine, and for that purpose to appoint workmen and others, and to pay and allow them such remuneration as he shall think fit.

The relation between the defendant and the company was strictly that of creditor and debtor. The agreement of December 16, 1873, in connection with the power of attorney, was simply a method of securing the defendant, as a creditor of the company, for past and future advances, and to insure the delivery of the ore which he had bought and paid for. The irrevocable character of the appointment of J. H. N. Patrick as manager, with the power given to the defendant to suspend and remove him, and to appoint another manager in his place, on consultation with the board of directors of the company, was an incident of the [151] security to the defendant, and a means of having the operation of the mine continued until the debt to him should be discharged. Any new manager to be appointed was to have the rights, powers and authority delegated to J. N. H. Patrick under the agreement, and none others. The agreement did not in any manner make the defendant a partner with the company, or with J. N. H. Patrick, or make J. N. H. Patrick the agent of the defendant in managing the mine, so as to make the defendant responsible for any contract entered into by J. N. H. Patrick. The company continued to be the owner of the mine, operating it through J. N. H. Patrick, as its manager, agent and attorney, and responsible for his contracts as such. Cox v. Hickman, 8 H. L. Cas. 268; Mollwo v. Court of Wards, L. R. 4 P. C. App. 419; Cassidy v. Hall, 97 N. Y. 159.

This being the proper legal view of the papers of December 16, 1873, the defendant, at the trial, asked the court to charge the jury as follows: "The jury are instructed that the contract between the Flagstaff Mining Company and the defendant, and the power of attorney from the company to J. N. H. Patrick, constituted J. N. H. Patrick the sole manager and controller of the mine, for the time being, as the general agent and representative of the company, and that the attitude of Erwin Davis, as a creditor of the company, to whom J. N. H. Patrick was bound to pay all profits of working the mine, did not render him personally liable for any of the expenses incurred by J. N. H. Patrick while working and operating the mine pursuant to the agreement and situation created by the contract and power of attorney. The legal effect of the contract and power of attorney was to give to the defendant, Davis, security for the indebtedness of the company to him, and was not in any way to render him liable personally for any debts of the company incurred in working the mine, in hauling ores or otherwise." The court gave this instruction with the following qualification and comment: "Of course that is to be taken in connection with the other instructions, if the original transaction between J. N. H. Patrick and the Flagstaff Company was what it purports to be; but if Davis was the [152] real party, then he is liable here." The defendant excepted to the giving of this qualification and comment.

This qualification and comment put aside entirely the legal effect of the agreement and the power of attorney, as those papers were construed by the court, and which construction was the correct one, and left it to the jury to determine what was the relation of the defendant to the business, and to ignore entirely the legal effect of the instruments. There was nothing ambiguous in the terms of the agreement, and there is nothing in the record to show that it did not truly represent the actual relations between the company and the defendant, and the actual circumstances of the connection of the defendant and of J. N. H. Patrick with the enterprise.

In another portion of the instruction of the court to the jury, it stated to the jury, under the exception of the defendant, that if they should conclude "that Davis was the Flagstaff Mining Company, operating the mine for his own use and benefit, then his liability is fixed and he cannot escape it. That is plaintiff's theory, and it may be a reasonable or an unreasonable one. If the testimony convinces you that the plaintiff's theory is correct, then you are justified in finding a verdict for the full amount claimed for these services, if they are according to contract price." This was substantially an instruction to the jury that they might conclude, from the terms of the agreement, that the defendant was the company, and that, if they should conclude that the agreement made J. N. H. Patrick the agent of the defendant, and not the agent of the company, in the management of the mine, then the defendant was liable to the plaintiff. This instruction overrode the legal purport of the agreement and was erroneous.

The court further instructed the jury as follows, under the exception of the defendant: "There is another view of the case, in which there may possibly be a liability. It is claimed that the ores hauled by Patrick were really the ores that belonged to Davis, independent of any person operating the mines. If that be so, and Patrick undertook to haul them for the defendant, by direction of the superintendent of the mines, representing Mr. Davis, the defendant would be [153] liable. If the ores belonged to him, then he would be required to pay for the hauling, if his agent represented him in the matter of making the alleged contract. If you are satisfied that the mines were operated by Davis, that he received the profits arising from the same, or that the ores belonged to Davis, and Patrick was employed by a representative of Davis to haul the same, then Davis would be liable for the hauling of the same." In this instruction, the theory of the liability of the defendant was that he really owned the ores which were hauled by the plaintiff; and that J. N. H. Patrick represented the defendant in procuring the plaintiff to haul them. This assumed liability of the defendant was not made to rest upon any connection which the defendant had with the management of the mine, or upon the written agreement between the defendant and the company, or the relation created by that agreement. But we do not understand the testimony of M. T. Patrick or any other testimony in the case, as showing that the ores hauled belonged to the defendant, independently of his relations with the company, created by the written agreement; nor that the testimony purports to show anything as to the ownership of the ores by the defendant, other than that the ores taken from the mine belonged to the defendant as the operator of the mine for the company. The testimony of M. T. Patrick shows that the proceeds of all the ores mined and hauled by A. S. Patrick to the smelting furnace, and smelted and sold, were deposited in bank in the name of the company; that the books and accounts were all kept in the name of the company; and that the mine was run in the name of the company. The entire testimony is to the effect that the ores taken from the mine did not belong to the defendant, independently of the fact that he was operating the mine for the company. J. N. H. Patrick testifies as follows: "There were no ores delivered to Davis during my management; all ores mined and hauled by plaintiff were smelted and sold, and the money put in the bank to the credit of the company, and went to pay expenses of running the mine." It does not appear that any ore taken from the mine was delivered to the defendant as a portion [154] of the ore referred to in the written agreement as purchased by him from the company, or that that portion of the agreement was ever carried into execution. The last instruction quoted was, therefore, based upon an erroneous theory, unsupported by evidence; and the jury may have rendered its verdict upon this erroneous theory, ignoring the view that the defendant was the company. This second erroneous instruction may therefore have misled the jury to the injury of the defendant.

For these errors, the judgment is reversed and the case is remanded to the Circuit Court, with a direction to award a new trial.

HOWARD MELVILLE HANNA ET AL.,
Owners of the Propeller COMET.

(See S. C. "The Manitoba," Reporter's ed. 97-111.)

Admiralty—collision—decree where both vessels are in fault—recovery of appraised value under limited liability proceedings, being less than half of the difference between the respective losses, with interest from date of the decree of the district court.

1. Where, in a case of collision, both vessels are in fault, the damages done to both should be added and the sum be equally divided, the decree being in favor of the owners of the vessel which suffered most, and against the owners of the other for one half of the difference between the amounts of their respective losses.

2. Upon a libel and a cross libel to recover damages resulting from a collision between the propeller Comet and the steamboat Manitoba, causing a total loss of the former and injury to the latter, it is held: that both vessels were in fault; that the damages should be equally divided; and that the owners of The Comet are entitled to recover the appraised value of The Manitoba and her pending freight under limited liability proceedings, being a less sum than one half of the difference between the respective losses of the owners of the two vessels, with interest on said sum from the date of the decree of the district court, and costs on appeal.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. F. H. Canfield and William A. Moore, for appellants.

Messrs. H. H. Swan and H. L. Terrell, for appellees.

[98] Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

The propeller Comet and the steamboat Manitoba came into collision, between 8 and 9 o'clock in the evening of the 26th of August, 1875, on the waters of Lake Superior, about six or seven miles to the southward and eastward from Whitsfish Point, on the south shore of that lake, The Comet being bound from Grand Island, in Lake Superior, to Cleveland, Ohio, and The Manitoba being on a voyage from Sarnia, Ontario, to Duluth in Minnesota. The Manitoba struck The Comet on her port bow, causing her to sink almost immediately, and she and her cargo were totally lost. The Manitoba was also injured.

Howard M. Hanna and George W. Chapin, as owners of The Comet, filed a libel in rem against The Manitoba, on the 4th of September, 1875, in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan, to recover damages for the loss of The Comet and her cargo and freight money, claiming $70,125, being $30,000 for The Comet, $35,000 for her cargo, and $5,125 as freight money. The libel alleges that the collision was occasioned solely by the negligence and unskillfulness of the persons navigating The Manitoba, "in not having proper officers and men on duty and at their posts, in not porting, signaling, answering signals or stopping engine, and in starboarding and running into and upon said propeller, and, by said omissions of duty and other omissions of duty, and by said and other wrong movements and misconduct, solely causing said collision, and making it inevitable by any conduct, [99] vigilance or effort on the part of those in charge of the" Comet.

The statement of the libel is that The Comet made the white light, and, shortly afterward, the red light, of The Manitoba, off the port bow of The Comet, the night being clear; that The Manitoba was on a course opposite or nearly opposite to that of The Comet; that The Comet proceeded on her course with such red light off her port bow, and properly ported her helm, and gave a single blast of her whistle, and stopped her engine; and that, although the lights of The Comet were properly set and burning, and visible to The Manitoba, The Manitoba, instead of porting and taking further measures to avoid The Comet, starboarded her wheel and struck The Comet on her port bow.

Henry Beatty and John D. Beatty appeared as claimants of The Manitoba, and, with Robert J. Hackett and Frederick B. Sibley as sureties, gave a bond for the release of The Manitoba, in the sum of $28,948.85, $200 of that sum being for costs.

On the 17th of November, 1875, James H. Beatty, Henry Beatty, William Beatty and John D. Beatty answered the libel of the owners of The Comet. The answer denies the version of the occurrence given in the libel, and avers that The Manitoba made the bright light of The Comet when The Comet was heading upon nearly, if not quite, a parallel, opposite course to that of The Manitoba, The Manitoba being on a course about northwest half north; that The Comet showed her bright and green lights bearing from one half to three quarters of a point on the starboard bow of The Manitoba; that The Manitoba starboarded half a point and was steadied on that course; that The Comet continued to approach The Manitoba, showing only her white and green lights, and as if to pass at a good, fair berth on the starboard hand of The Manitoba, until she appeared to be but a short distance off, when she was observed by the watch of The Manitoba to be swinging across the bows of The Manitoba, as if under a port wheel, upon which the engine of The Manitoba was at once checked, stopped, and backed, but it was not possible for her to avoid the collision; and that The Manitoba suffered $5,000 damages. The answer denies the allegations of fault in The Manitoba, set forth in the libel, and alleges that the collision was [100] caused entirely by the fault of those navigating The Comet, in that (1) she did not have competent officers and watch on deck carefully attending to duty; (2) she did not keep her course and pass The Manitoba on her starboard hand, but recklessly attempted to cross the bow of The Manitoba when she was so near as to make collision probable; (3) she did not stop and reverse, but kept up a reckless speed, in her approach to The Manitoba, "when there was risk of collision." The answer also avers that, with the claim filed to The Manitoba, after her seizure under the warrant for her arrest, the respondents filed a petition setting forth that the claim of the libelants was much greater than the value of The Manitoba and her freight, and praying that she, and her freight then pending, might be appraised; and that such proceedings were had that the claimants gave a bond, with sureties, in the sum of $28,950, as a substitute for the vessel and her freight then pending. The answer claims the benefit of a limitation of liability, under the Act of Congress, against any recovery for any sum greater than the penal sum named in said bond.

On the same day, the owners of The Manitoba filed a cross libel against Hanna and Chapin, as owners of The Comet, to recover the damages caused to The Manitoba by the collision, being $5,000. The cross libel gives the same account of the collision that is given in the answer to the libel, and alleges the same faults on the part of The Comet.

The case rested in this position for more than two years, when Hanna and Chapin filed an answer to the cross libel, denying its allegations as to the facts attending the collision, alleging the facts to be as set forth in the original libel, and denying any fault on the part of The Comet. It also avers that, as The Comet and her pending freight were totally lost by the collision, her owners became, by virtue of section 4283 of the Revised Statutes, discharged from any liability to the cross libelants by reason of the collision.

The two cases were heard together before the district court, and, on the 29th of April, 1878, it made a decree, on pleadings and proofs, that [101] the damages be divided, and referred it to a commissioner to report their amount.

On the 14th of June, 1880, the commissioner reported as follows: value of The Comet, a total loss, $25,000; value of her cargo, $31,941.88; freight money earned by her at the time of the collision, $500; making a total of $57,441.88. He reported the damage to The Manitoba to be $5,000.

On a hearing on the report, the district court, on the 15th of March, 1882, made a decree, entitled in both causes, confirming the report at the amounts so reported by the commissioner. The decree then proceeded as follows: "And it further appearing to the court, that the said libelants and cross libelants have respectively claimed the benefit of the Act of Congress of the United States entitled 'An Act to Limit the Liability of Ship Owners, and for Other Purposes,' being sections 4283, 4284, 4285 and 4286 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and that the said steamer Manitoba has been duly bonded in accordance with the provisions of said statutes, by Henry Beatty and John D. Beatty, claimants, and Robert J. Hackett and Frederick B. Sibley, as sureties, in the sum of $28,694.95, by their bond or stipulation, conditioned to abide the decree of this court, and consenting that unless they shall so do execution should issue against them therefor, which sum is less than the damages occasioned by said collision; and this court having, by its interlocutory decree heretofore entered in this cause, found that both of said vessels were in fault for said collision, and that the damages occasioned thereby be equally divided, it is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed, that said libelants recover from the said claimants and their sureties the sum of twenty-eight thousand six hundred ninety-four $\frac{95}{100}$ ($28,694.95), being the amount of said bond or stipulation, and that said libelants have execution therefor against said Henry Beatty, John D. Beatty, Robert J. Hackett, and Frederick B. Sibley; and it is further ordered that neither the libelants nor the cross libelants herein recover costs against the other." This decree was proper in its figures. Allowing interest on the damages from the date of the collision to the date of the decree (which [102] was proper) and fixing the liability for the $28,694.95 as of the date of the decree (which was proper, in view of the fact that the condition of the bond was to "abide and answer the decree," and so the $28,694.95 did not carry interest prior to the date of the decree), The Manitoba was liable to pay to The Comet $36,476.74, on a proper computation based on a division of the damages, according to the principle of computation hereinafter stated, and The Manitoba had the proper limitation of liability in paying only $28,694.95, at the date of the decree. The discrepancy between that amount and the amount stated in the bond is not explained, but is not remarked upon by the parties. The obligors in such a bond are not liable for interest prior to the decree of the district court, but are liable for interest from the date of such decree. The Ann Caroline, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 538 [17: 883]; The Wanata, 95 U. S. 600 [24: 461].

The owners of The Manitoba, on the 18th of April, 1882, appealed to the circuit court from so much of the final decree of the district court, of March 15, 1882, as adjudged The Manitoba to be in fault for the collision, and also from so much of that decree as awarded to Hanna and Chapin the sum of $28,694.95, "without any deduction or allowance therefrom to these appellants on account of injuries occasioned by said collision to the said steamer Manitoba," and also from so much of the interlocutory decree of the 29th of April, 1878, as decreed that The Manitoba was in fault for the collision, and that the damages occasioned thereby should be equally divided between the owners of The Comet and the owners of The Manitoba. The owners of The Manitoba perfected their appeal, by giving a stipulation for damages and costs, in the sum of $35,000, in the names of James H. Beatty, Henry Beatty, and John D. Beatty, with the Detroit Dry Dock Company as surety. The owners of The Comet did not appeal. The circuit court heard the case on pleadings and proofs, and filed its finding of facts and conclusions of law, entitled in both causes, on the 26th of December, 1883, as follows:

"That the collision between the propeller Comet and the steamship Manitoba took place between the hours of eight and nine o'clock on the night of the 26th of August, 1875, and at [103] about six or seven miles distant from, and to the southward and eastward of, Whitefish Point, on the south shore of Lake Superior; that at that time said propeller was bound down the lake, upon a voyage from Grand Island to Cleveland, Ohio, and, when she made The Manitoba's light, her general course was southward. The Manitoba was moving in nearly an opposite direction, on a voyage from Sarnia, Ontario, to Duluth, Minnesota. She first made The Comet's light when she was between Whitefish Point and Point Iroquois, her general course then being northwest half north. The officers of each of the colliding vessels discovered, soon after The Comet had rounded Whitefish Point, first the white and soon thereafter the green lights of each other, and they continued to approach each other on nearly parallel opposite courses, each showing to the other her white and green lights only. Both vessels had the usual complement of officers and men. When they were from one and a half to two miles apart The Manitoba had The Comet's green light about three quarters of a point on her starboard bow. The Manitoba then starboarded her wheel half a point, and continued her course without change until just before the collision. In the meantime The Comet ported her wheel for the second time half a point, and the two vessels thus continued to approach each other, showing their green and white lights only, until they had come within from 400 to 500 feet of each other, The Comet being then from 200 to 300 feet on the starboard side of The Manitoba, and if each had kept their respective courses, they would have passed without colliding; but at this juncture The Comet ported her wheel, displayed her red light, and suddenly sheered across The Manitoba's course. The Manitoba thereupon starboarded her wheel, and the collision ensued. At the time, The Manitoba was running about eleven and The Comet about nine miles an hour. The Manitoba struck The Comet on her port bow, which caused her to sink in about two minutes, whereby she and her cargo were irrecoverably lost and The Manitoba quite severely injured. Neither of said vessels sounded any signal of the whistle, indicating the side it intended or desired to take; nor did either of them reverse its engine or slacken its speed until the collision [104] was inevitable; but The Manitoba did, just before or about the time it collided with The Comet, reverse its engine. The fact that the two vessels were moving on nearly parallel, opposite, but slightly converging, lines was manifest and apparent to the officers of both, for some considerable time before The Comet ported and ran across The Manitoba's course, as hereinbefore stated. Nevertheless, neither, as hereinbefore stated, slackened speed, changed its course, or signaled its intentions. The relative courses of these vessels, and the bearing of their lights, and the manifest uncertainty as to The Comet's intentions, in connection with all the surrounding facts, called for the closest watch, and the highest degree of diligence, on the part of both, with reference to the movements of the other; and it behooved those in charge of them to be prompt in availing themselves of any resource to avoid, not only a collision, but the risk of such a catastrophe. If the requisite precautions had been observed by both or by either of said vessels, the collision, in the opinion of the court, would not have happened. Each vessel misapprehended the purposes of the other. The Comet was endeavoring to apply article 18 of chapter 5, title 'Commerce and Navigation,' of the Revised Statutes of the United States, while The Manitoba probably believed, until The Comet's sudden sheer across her bow, that The Comet intended to pass on her starboard side. It was this misapprehension on the part of said respective vessels, which might have been timely obviated by proper signals from either, that occasioned the collision."

The court then finds the value of The Comet, and of her cargo and pending freight, and the damage to The Manitoba, at the amounts reported by the commissioner; that the value of The Manitoba and her pending freight was duly appraised under the order of the district court, and proceedings were had pursuant to sections 4283 to 4286 of the Revised Statutes, [105] and security was filed for such appraised value in the sum of $28,694.95; and that the owners of both vessels claimed and are entitled to the benefit of those sections. The court then proceeds:

"And from these facts the court deduces the following conclusions of law: 1. That said vessels were not meeting end on or nearly end on, within the meaning of article 18, of chapter 5, of title XLVIII, 'Commerce and Navigation,' of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and that The Manitoba was not, in view of the circumstances of the case, in fault for starboarding her wheel just prior to said collision. 2. That the immediate or proximate cause of the collision was the putting by The Comet of her wheel hard-a-port, as herein previously found, and endeavoring to cross on the port side of The Manitoba, and that she was in fault for so doing. 3. That The Manitoba was in fault in ignoring the fact that The Comet was approaching under a port wheel, and that the courses of the two vessels were convergent and involved risk of collision, and in failing to take proper precaution in time to prevent the collision which afterwards occurred. 4. That she was further in fault in not indicating her course by her whistle, and for not slowing up, and in failing to reverse her engine until it was too late to accomplish anything thereby. 5. That both vessels were in fault in failing to take necessary and proper precautions against collision, which the circumstances manifestly required, and that the damages occasioned by said collision ought to be equally apportioned between said two vessels." The court further finds that the libelants are entitled to recover from the owners of The Manitoba, and their sureties on appeal, by reason of the limited liability proceedings, only the sum of $28,694.95, and interest thereon from March 7, 1882, the date of the decree of the district court, together with the costs of the libelants on the appeal; that, to the extent of the $28,694.95, the libelants are entitled to enforce payment of their damages against the claimants of The Manitoba, and their surviving surety, on the stipulation filed in the district court for the appraised value of The Manitoba; and that, by reason of the total loss of The Comet and her cargo, and the provisions as to limited liability, and the fact that [106] one moiety of the damages suffered by the libelants far exceeds the damages suffered by the owners of The Manitoba, and interest thereon, the owners of the Manitoba are not entitled to recover any sum whatever from the libelants.

On the 18th of March, 1884, the circuit court made a final decree, entitled in both causes, which fixes the damages at the amounts reported by the commissioner, and declares that both vessels were in fault for the collision; that the damages shall be equally divided; that the owners of both vessels claim and are entitled to the benefit of a limitation of liability; and that the sum of $28,694.95, at which The Manitoba and her pending freight were appraised in the limited liability proceedings and bonded, is less than one moiety of the damages occasioned by the collision; and then proceeds as follows:

"It is, therefore, ordered, adjudged and decreed, that said libelants, Howard M. Hanna and George W. Chapin, do recover of and from said James H. Beatty, Henry Beatty, William Beatty, and John D. Beatty, claimants of said steamer Manitoba, and appellants herein, and of and from the Detroit Dry Dock Company, their surety on the bond or stipulation on appeal, filed in this court, the sum of $28,694.95, and the further sum of $3,395.50, being the interest, at 6 per cent per annum, on the aforesaid sum of 28,694.95, from the 7th day of March, 1882, the date of the decree of the district court, to the date of the decree of this court herein, in all, the sum of $32,090.45, together also with the costs of said libelants in this court, to be taxed, upon the appeal of said claimants of said steamer Manitoba from the decree of the district court on said libel and cross libel.

"And it further appearing to the court that said Robert J. Hackett, one of the sureties on the bond or stipulation filed in the district court for the appraised value of the steamer Manitoba and her freight, as aforesaid, has deceased, it is therefore, ordered, adjudged and decreed, that said libelants, Howard M. Hanna and George W. Chapin, do recover of and from the said James H. Beatty, Henry Beatty, William Beatty, and John D. Beatty, claimants of the steamer Manitoba, and Frederick B. Sibley, their surviving surety upon the bond for the appraised value of said steamer Manitoba and her [107] freight, pending at the time of the collision mentioned in the pleadings in this cause, the sum of $28,694.95, in case of nonpayment thereof by the claimants and their surety on appeal to this court.

"And that said libelants, Howard M. Hanna and George W. Chapin, have execution for the damages and costs to them adjudged and decreed by the judgment and decree of this court, against said claimants, James Beatty, Henry Beatty, William Beatty, and John D. Beatty, and the Detroit Dry Dock Company, their surety on the bond or stipulation given by said claimants on appeal to this court, for the aforesaid sum of $28,694.95, and said further sum of $3,395.50, as interest thereon, and for the costs of said libelants in this court, to be taxed.

"And it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that, for the recovery of the damages decreed to libelants by the decree of the district court and of this court, libelants have execution against James H. Beatty, Henry Beatty, William Beatty, and John D. Beatty, claimants, and said Frederick B. Sibley, their surviving surety on the bond or stipulation for the appraised value of said steamer Manitoba and the freight pending as aforesaid, in and for the amount of $28,694.95, the appraised value thereof as aforesaid, provided proceedings shall be had on the bond or stipulation given on appeal to this court, by said claimants of said steamer Manitoba, before recourse shall be had for collection on the bond or stipulation filed in the district court for the appraised value of the steamer Manitoba and her freight pending at the time of said collision."

The claimants of The Manitoba have appealed to this court from so much of the decree of the circuit court as decrees The Manitoba to be in fault for the collision, and from so much of it as awards to the original libelants $32,090.45, "without any deduction or allowance therefrom to these appellants on account of injuries occasioned by said collision to the said steamer Manitoba." The main question of law arising on the record is as to the liability of The Manitoba.

The circuit court finds, as one of its conclu- [108] sions of law, "that The Manitoba was in fault in ignoring the fact that The Comet was approaching under a port wheel, and that the courses of the two vessels were convergent, and involved risk of collision; and in failing to take proper precaution in time to prevent the collision which afterwards occurred." The expression "risk of collision," found in the third conclusion of law, is not contained in the findings of fact proper; and it is therefore insisted on the part of The Manitoba that it is not found as a fact that the courses of the two vessels involved risk of collision, by the movement of The Comet under a port wheel, in her approach to The Manitoba, prior to the time when she put her wheel hard-a-port and crossed the bows of The Manitoba. But we think this is not a correct view. The findings of fact state that, when the vessels were from one and a half to two miles apart, The Manitoba had The Comet's green light about three quarters of a point on her starboard bow, and that The Manitoba then starboarded her wheel half a point and continued her course without change until just before the collision. This starboarding would bring the green light of The Comet further on the starboard bow of The Manitoba; but, in the meantime, The Comet ported her wheel half a point; and it is not found that the green light of The Comet continued to open wider to the view of The Manitoba. On the contrary, the findings state that the fact that the two vessels were moving on nearly parallel, opposite, buts lightly converging, lines, was apparent to the officers of both vessels for some considerable time before The Comet ported her wheel, and displayed her red light to The Manitoba, and suddenly sheered across the course of The Manitoba. The findings also state that, from the relative courses of the two vessels, and the bearing of their lights, there was manifest uncertainty as to the intentions of The Comet, and that this called for the closest watch, and the highest degree of diligence, on the part of The Manitoba, with reference to the movements of The Comet, and that it behooved those in charge of her to be prompt in availing themselves of any resource to avoid, not only a collision, but the risk of such a catastrophe. The findings further state that neither of the vessels sounded any signal of the whistle indicating the [109] side it intended or desired to take, nor did either of them reverse its engine or slacken its speed until the collision was inevitable; and that, if the requisite precautions, meaning the precautions just mentioned, had been observed by both or either of the vessels, the collision would not have happened.

In addition to the facts thus found, the answer of the claimants of The Manitoba to the original libel charges as a fault in The Comet, that she did not stop and reverse, but kept up a reckless speed in her approach to The Manitoba, "when there was risk of collision." This allegation is repeated in the cross libel of the owners of The Manitoba. If there was risk of collision in the approach of The Comet towards The Manitoba prior to the sudden sheer of The Comet, it was a risk affecting The Manitoba equally with The Comet, and imposing upon her the same duties of slackening her speed, or, if necessary, stopping and reversing, under Rule 21 of section 4233 of the Revised Statutes, which it imposed on The Comet.

On the facts, the circuit court found, as a conclusion of law, and we think correctly, that The Manitoba was in fault in not indicating her course, by her whistle, and in not slow ing up, and in failing to reverse her engine until it was too late to accomplish anything thereby.

The facts in this case are very much like those in The Stanmore, 10 Prob. Div. 184, where one of two steam vessels, under like circumstances with those of The Manitoba, was held in fault for not stopping and reversing, although the collision was mainly caused by the fault of the other vessel, which was also condemned.

A few words are necessary on the question as to whether, in the amount decreed to the original libelants, by the circuit court, allowance is made to the owners of The Manitoba on account of the damages to her. The findings of fact state that the owners of both vessels are entitled to the benefit of a limitation of liability, and that the owners of The Comet are entitled to recover from the owners of The Manitoba and their sureties on appeal, by reason of the proceedings for a limitation of liability, only $28,694.95, and interest thereon from March 7, [110] 1882, the date of the decree of the district court. The decree of the circuit court states that the value of The Manitoba and her freight pending at the time of the collision was duly appraised, in the proceedings for a limitation of liability, at the sum of $28,694.95, and that she was duly bonded for that sum, "which sum," the decree states "is less than one moiety of the damages occasioned by said collision." Those damages, with interest at 6 per cent per annum from the date of the collision to the date of the decree of the circuit court, amounted to $93,288.16. One half of that is $46,644.08. On the ground that the amount of the appraised value of The Manitoba and her pending freight was "less than one moiety of the damages occasioned" by the collision, the circuit court adjudged that the owners of The Comet should recover from the claimants of The Manitoba, and from their surety on appeal, the Detroit Dry Dock Company, the sum of $28,694.95, with interest thereon from the 7th of March, 1882, the date of the decree of the district court; and should recover from the claimants of The Manitoba and the surviving surety on the bond given in the district court for the appraised value of The Manitoba and her pending freight, the sum of $28,694.95, in case of nonpayment thereof by the claimants and the Detroit Dry Dock Company.

We had occasion to consider this subject at length in the case of The North Star, 106 U. S. 17 [27:91], in which Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court. In that case there was a collision between two steam vessels, The Ella Warley and The North Star. The circuit court held both vessels in fault, The Ella Warley being sunk and lost and The North Star damaged. There was a libel in rem against The North Star and a libel in personam against the owners of The Ella Warley. The circuit court rendered a decree in favor of the owners of The Ella Warley for so much of the damage to her (it being greater than that sustained by The North Star), as exceeded one half of the aggregate damage sustained by both vessels. The owners of The Ella Warley had claimed the benefit of a limitation of liability. On appeals to this court by both parties, it was contended on behalf of The Ella Warley, that, [111] as she was a total loss, the half of the damage to her must be paid in full, without any deduction for the half of the damage sustained by The North Star. This court, after a full examination of the subject, held that the proper rule was, that, as each vessel was liable for one half of the damage done to both, if one suffered more than the other the difference should be equally divided, and the one which suffered least should be decreed to pay one half of such difference to the one which suffered most, so as to equalize the burden. In other words, as both parties were in fault, the damage done to both vessels should be added together in one sum and equally divided, and a decree be pronounced in favor of the owners of the vessel which suffered most, against those of the vessel which suffered least, for one half of the difference between the amounts of their respective losses. The House of Lords established the same rule in Stoomvaart Maatschappy Nederland v. Penins. & Oriental Steam Nav. Co. 7 App. Cas. 795.

Applying this rule to the present case, the amount of the aggregate damage to both vessels, computed with interest to the date of the decree of the circuit court, was $93,288.16, being for The Comet, $85,818.16, and for The Manitoba, $7,470. One half of this was $46,644.08. The loss of the owners of The Comet and of her cargo and pending freight was greater than that of the owners of The Manitoba by the sum of $78,348.16. One half of that difference was $39,174.08. That was the amount of the liability of The Manitoba to The Comet, at the date of the decree of the circuit court, on a division of the damages, after a proper allowance to The Manitoba for the damage to her, and without reference to the limitation of liability. As the amount of the bond of The Manitoba, $28,694.95, with interest at 6 per cent per annum, from the date of the decree of the district court to the date of the decree of the circuit court, was only $32,090.45, The Manitoba had the proper limitation of liability allowed to her by the decree of the circuit court, and was entitled to that limitation.

Decree affirmed.

NORTHWESTERN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff. in Err., [501]

v.

MUSKEGON NATIONAL BANK.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 501-513.)

Life insurance—"habitually intemperate"—construction—question for jury—instructions—court not bound to repeat, where it has correctly and fully laid down the law—evidence.

1. Where, in instructing the jury in regard to any particular subject or point pertinent to the case, the court has laid down the law correctly and so fully as to cover all that is proper to be said on the subject, it is not bound to repeat its instructions in terms varied to suit the wishes of either party.

2. In an action to recover on a policy of life insurance, the issues being upon allegations of habitual intemperance before and after its issue, it is held: that the questions whether the insured was of intemperate habits at the time the policy was issued, and whether he became habitually intemperate after its issue, were for the jury; that the instructions given were fair and full; that certain instructions asked by the defendant were properly refused because unnecessary and improper in form; that the opinions of witnesses as to the effect on the health of the insured, at the date of the policy, of intemperance four and five years before, are inadmissible.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Edward Salomon, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. John E. Parsons, for defendant in error:

Whether Comstock was habitually intemperate was a question of fact to be decided by the jury. For the court to tell them that a spree once a year, or a certain number of sprees in a given period, made a man habitually intemperate was to take from the jury the very question upon which they were to pass.

[502] Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

The Muskegon National Bank recovered a judgment, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, against the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company, upon a policy of insurance on the life of Erwin G. Comstock for $23,717.04, and to this judgment the present writ of error is directed.

The Bank had an insurance upon the life of Comstock, its debtor, for the sum of $20,000. On the trial before the jury, although some other issues were made in the pleadings, the contest turned, so far as the assignments of error are presented here, on the condition of Comstock in regard to the habit of drinking alcoholic liquors. The policy and the application for it, the answers to which were signed [503] both by Comstock and the Bank through its president, present the foundation of the controversy. The sixteenth interrogatory is as follows: "Are you, or have you ever been, in the habit of using alcoholic beverages or other stimulants?" The answer to this was "Yes, occasionally." The twenty-second interrogatory, "Have you read and assented to the following agreement?" was answered "Yes." This agreement, so far as it touches the present issue, reads as follows: "It is hereby declared that the above are the applicant's own fair and true answers to the foregoing questions, and that the applicant is not, and will not become, habitually intemperate or addicted to the use of opium." The body of the policy declared that if Comstock shall become intemperate, so as to impair his health or induce delirium tremens, or if any statement in the application, on the faith of which the policy is made, shall be found to be in any material respect untrue, the policy is void.

Upon this language in the application and the policy, the defendant founded two separate pleas or defenses.

First. That "At the time of making and presenting said application as aforesaid, and of the issuing of said policy, the said Erwin G. Comstock was and prior thereto had been habitually intemperate, and that the said statement in said application contained, that said Erwin G. Comstock was not then habitually intemperate, was untrue, and fraudulently made, and a suppression of facts material to the risk assumed by said policy of insurance."

Second. That "said policy was issued by this defendant and accepted by said plaintiff upon the express condition, amongst others contained therein, that if said Erwin G. Comstock should become either habitually intemperate or so far intemperate as to impair health or induce delirium tremens, the said policy should be null and void; that in fact, as this defendant is informed and believes, the said Erwin G. Comstock did, after the issuing of said policy, become habitually intemperate, and so far intemperate as to impair his health and induce delirium tremens, and that thereby the said policy became and is null and void."

The issues were tried upon the two allegations of habitual intemperance before and [504] after the issue of the policy. The Company, discarding other issues, assumed the affirmative on these two pleas, and on a plea of suicide, which seems to have been abandoned, and thereby obtained the opening and the conclusion to the jury. The assignments of error raise objections to the action of the court in excluding answers to questions propounded to witnesses for the defendant Company on the trial, as well as its refusal to give certain instructions prayed for by the defendant to the jury.

A witness for the defendant, named Torrent, testified that he knew Comstock at Muskegon from 1868 to 1875. The policy of insurance was taken out in New York in 1879. The witness further stated that he was well acquainted with Comstock in Muskegon, and knew that he was addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors during the period of their acquaintance; had seen him drunk; knew of his being on prolonged sprees, and gave other testimony to the effect that he did use intoxicating liquors to excess. He was then asked this question: "Up to the time your acquaintance with him ceased, what would you say as to whether his drinking had affected his health or impaired his vital powers in any respect?" To this he answered: "I think it had affected him materially; I think it had affected his nerves and impaired his health generally, general debility; the symptoms of that were his general looks, and that at the time he went away, or just before, he was taken very sick, and they didn't know whether he was going to be alive or die; that was the general impression." The court excluded this answer, and the defendant excepted. The witness also testified that he saw him during that sickness, and that he was then sick for about three weeks, adding: "I think he had the delirium tremens." This expression of opinion was also excluded.

It is to be observed that the witness had testified to all the facts which he knew, without objection, that tended to establish a habit of intemperance in Comstock prior to 1875. What he was next asked, and what he then testified to, was his opinion in regard to the effect of this intemperance upon the health of the assured. It will be noted that all this occurred between four and five years before the execution [505] of the policy. We are of opinion that while the facts recited by this witness and received in evidence might have some remote tendency to show Comstock's habits in regard to temperance at the time to which they related, his opinion of their effect upon his health at the date of the policy, four years later, was inadmissible as to that or his habits, as he knew nothing of these during that period.

The exception to the testimony of Barney, who undertook to detail conversations with a doctor attending Comstock prior to 1875, as to whether Comstock was threatened with delirium tremens or not, and the statement of the witness that he was afraid Comstock was going to have delirium tremens, which was excluded by the court, depend upon the same principle and are otherwise incompetent. We see no error in those rulings.

The remaining assignments of error have regard to prayers for instructions by the court to the jury, which were refused. No assignment of error is founded on any exception taken to the charge of the judge who tried the case, which seems to have been eminently fair and very full, and in our opinion embraced all that was necessary to be said to the jury on the subject. The questions which the jury had to respond to were whether Comstock was of intemperate habits at the time the policy was taken out, and whether he became habitually intemperate after that period. The whole case turned, so far as the jury was concerned, upon the true definition of the words "habitually intemperate," taken in connection with the testimony on the subject, at these two different periods. The plaintiff was not bound to prove that the assured was temperate, or that he was a temperate man, but the defendant was bound to prove not only that Comstock was intemperate at those periods, but that he was habitually so. This it was bound to do by such a preponderance of testimony as should satisfy the jury that at one of these periods or the other he was habitually intemperate. We do not know of any established legal definition of those words. As they relate to the customs and habits of men generally in regard to the use of intoxicating drinks, and as the observation and experience of one man on that subject is as good as another [506] of equal capacity and opportunities, their true meaning and signification would seem to be a question addressed rather to the jury than to the court. While there may be on the one hand such a clear case of intemperate habits as to justify the court in saying that such and such facts constitute a condition of habitual intemperance, or on the other such an entire absence of any proof, beyond an occasional indulgence in the use of ardent spirits, as to warrant the opposite conclusion, yet the main field of inquiry, and the determination of the question within it, must be submitted to the jury; and the question on this submission must be decided by them.

The testimony in this case is all embodied in the record, and is contradictory. It must be divided into its relations to the two periods, before and after the execution of the policy. It is seen from the testimony that Comstock left Muskegon, where many of these witnesses resided who testify as to his excessive use of intoxicating drinks, prior to 1875, and that they know nothing of his habits after that. The policy was taken out in 1879. It is also quite clear that, under a pledge made to one of his partners in business, he had refrained from the use of intoxicating drinks from the first of June, 1878, up to the time of taking out this policy, and continued so to refrain up to March, 1880. There are several witnesses who testify that after his removal to New York in 1875, he was drunk, had sprees once in a while, and perhaps several of them up to the time when he made made this pledge to his partner. There are others who testify that after March, 1880, he was again seen intoxicated and had spells of confinement on account of those sprees. On the other hand, there were four or five witnesses examined, some of whom were in the same building in which Comstock was employed in New York, who saw him daily, and transacted business with him for the two or three years prior to his death, which was in 1881, who testify that they never saw him drunk, or under the influence of liquor, and did not suppose that he was addicted to drinking, but that he was a prompt, efficient business man, and that they had no suspicion that he was intemperate or [507] indulged in the excessive use of stimulants. Among these, Mr. Samuel Borrow, Vice President of the Equitable Life Assurance Society, in whose building Comstock was a tenant, says that he saw him almost daily for two or three years prior to his death, that he struck him as a very energetic, active man, and that he never saw him under such circumstances as to suggest that he had been drinking.

Under these circumstances, and in view of this conflicting testimony, the following language of the judge in his charge to the jury in this case seems to contain all that was necessary for him to say by way of assisting them to arrive at a just verdict:

"I think that there is no rule of law which says that in order to make a man a drunkard he must drink every day or every week to excess. Neither, on the other hand, does a single or an occasional excess make a man an habitual drunkard; but, if you find that the habit and rule of a man's life is to indulge periodically and with frequency, and with increasing frequency and violence, in excessive fits of intemperance, such a use of liquor may properly cause the finding of habitual drunkenness. It is the fact of the certainty of these periodical sprees, accompanied with their frequency, which marks the habit. If a man should indulge in such a debauch once in a year only, it could not, in my opinion, properly be said that he was an habitual drunkard; he would be an occasional drunkard. But if such debauches increased in frequency, and the certainty of their increasing frequency becomes established, then the time finally arrives when the line between an occasional excess and habit is crossed. It is for you to say whether Comstock was at the time of the application, or became afterwards, the victim of such a habit."

"If you find that, after the making of the policy, Comstock became so far intemperate as to impair his health, the policy is avoided, and the verdict will be for the defendant."

At the request of the defendant, he also gave to the jury the following instructions:

[508] "If the jury find from the evidence that Erwin G. Comstock was habitually intemperate when the application for the policy of insurance was made, then they must find for the defendant.

"If the jury find from the evidence that Erwin G. Comstock became habitually intemperate after the issuing of the policy, then they must find for the defendant.

"If the jury find from the evidence that, after the making of the policy, Erwin G. Comstock became so far intemperate as to impair his health, then they must find for the defendant."

Exceptions were taken and errors assigned in regard to the following instructions, which were asked and refused by the court:

First. "To be habitually intemperate it is not necessary that a person should be addicted to the excessive use of intoxicating liquors continually, or without interruption; but a person who, during a period of time sufficient to form a habit in that respect, is addicted to periodical 'sprees' of longer or shorter duration, when for days in succession he drinks intoxicating liquors to great excess, producing a state of continued drunkenness until prostration and sickness compel a cessation, and terminate the 'spree,' comes within the definition of being habitually intemperate, although such person may remain sober for a month, three or six months, or even a year at a time."

Second. "If the jury find from the evidence that for seven or eight years immediately prior to the 17th day of April, 1879, Erwin G. Comstock was addicted to periodical 'sprees,' when for several days and sometimes for a week or more in succession he would drink intoxicating liquors to great excess, producing a state of continued drunkenness until prostration and sickness intervened, then they must find for the defendant, although they may find that he would remain sober for a month, three or six months, or even a year at a time."

Third. "It was the duty of the plaintiff and of Erwin G. Comstock in their application for this policy of insurance to communicate to the defendant the fact that, for six or seven years immediately prior to the first day of June, 1878, [509] Comstock had been addicted to periodical sprees lasting for a longer or shorter period, when for days in succession he would drink intoxicating liquors to great excess, producing continued drunkenness, although he might remain sober for a month, three or six months, or longer, even, at a time; and their failure to disclose such facts to the defendant avoids the policy, and the jury must find for the defendant."

Fourth. This includes two charges which amount to very much the same thing. They are in the following words:

"If the jury should find from the evidence that for six or seven years immediately prior to the first day of June, 1878, Erwin G. Comstock had been addicted to periodical sprees, lasting for a longer or shorter period, when for days in succession he would drink intoxicating liquors to great excess, producing continued drunkenness, until sickness and prostration would intervene and terminate the spree; that such sprees would occur once in every three or six months or thereabouts; that on the first day of June, 1878, after the termination of one of such sprees, under threat of dissolution of partnership from his then partner, Mr. Hoagland, he gave a written pledge not to drink any more so long as he and Hoagland were associated in business; that his partnership with Hoagland ceased on the first day of May, 1879; that afterwards, during the years 1880 and 1881, he again became addicted to such periodical sprees; that during the year 1880 he had at least three such sprees; that during the year 1881, up to the latter part of April of that year, he had a number of such sprees of great intensity; that in one of those sprees, in or about the month of April, 1881, he subjected himself to the restraint of a nurse for several weeks in order to prevent himself from obtaining liquor; then the jury must find for the defendant.

"If the jury find from the evidence that after the making of the policy of insurance, during the years 1880 and 1881, Erwin G. Comstock became addicted to periodical sprees lasting for a number of days, or even a week or more, each time, when he would use intoxicating liquors to such excess as to produce continued drunkenness, and prostrate him and make him sick for several days; that such sprees occurred in or about the month of March, 1880, in or about [510] the month of July, 1880, again in or about the month of August, 1880, again on or about the first of January, 1881, again in or about the month of February, 1881, and again in or about the month of April, 1881; that his last sprees in February and April, 1881, were of such intensity that towards the close of the drinking period, when sick and prostrated, he subjected himself to nurses for a week and more each time, in order that they might assist him to become sober; then they must find for the defendant."

The first, second, and third of these prayers for instruction do not differ much from the substance of the charge of the court at its own instance. The language of that charge embodies the real principles upon which these three prayers are based, and in terms much more apt and just to both parties than that used by counsel. The court said, among other things: "Neither does a single or an occasional excess make a man an habitual drunkard; but, if you find that the habit and rule of a man's life is to indulge periodically and with frequency and with increasing frequency and violence in excessive fits of intemperance, such a use of liquor may properly cause the finding of habitual drunkenness." This is the substance, and in very strong language, of the three prayers above referred to for instruction which were refused by the court.

It has been often said by this court, and we repeat it now with emphasis, that if in regard to any particular subject or point pertinent to the case the court has laid down the law correctly and so fully as to cover all that is proper to be said on the subject, it is not bound to repeat this instruction in terms varied to suit the wishes of either party. Kelly v. Jackson, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 622 [8: 523]; Laber v. Cooper, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 565 [19: 151]; Indianapolis R. R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291 [23: 898]; R. Co. v. McCarthy, 96 U. S. 258 [24: 693]. If the charge of the judge, made at his own suggestion, covers the point in question, it is much more likely to be impartial, and correctly stated than it will be by counsel. [511]

These requests, however, are inadmissible, as we think, for other reasons. They all, as near as they dare, attempt to define approximately for the jury the number of times a man must get drunk, or have a spree, or how closely such excesses must succeed each other, to constitute "habitual intemperance." They also attempt to say how long a time a man must have abstained from drunkenness or sprees in order to relieve him from that charge. And especially are the requests obnoxious in saying that, under such circumstances, a person comes within the definition of being habitually intemperate, although he might remain sober for a month, three or six months, or longer, at a time; one of them says, "or even a year at a time." What effect should be given to an entire abstinence from the use of liquors for a whole year, in connection with occasional drunken sprees, before or after, is not for the court to determine. But if it were, it does not seem to us, in view of this testimony, that sufficient force was given to it in the rejected prayers. This reference to periods of abstinence from drink is still more objectionable when it is seen from the testimony that, during a continuous period, just before and after the taking out of this policy, Comstock was admitted to have been entirely sober, if not entirely abstinent from the use of ardent spirits, for a period of nearly two years. It would be rather harsh for a court to instruct a jury, as a matter of law, that a man who was sober nearly two years was at a period near the middle of that time "habitually intemperate." It was certainly a question to be left to the jury, on all the testimony, to draw their own conclusions in regard to the subject.

The two other requests are still more liable to these objections, inasmuch as they constitute an attempt to recite the various occasions on which the jury might infer that Comstock had been drunk, together with some vague description of the intervals between certain sprees, with an account of his struggles against his thirst for liquor; in fact they are a history of his life for six or seven years prior to the making of the contract for insurance down to the time of his death; from all of which there is sought to be deduced a positive instruction to the jury that they must find for the defendant. We do not think there was anything in the case which would have justified the court in thus taking the determination of it from the jury. The court had no right in this summing up to ignore the testimony of four or five respectable and intelligent gentlemen who knew Comstock well during the most important part of this period, during several years of it, who saw him almost daily, and who testify that they never had any reason to suppose that he used ardent spirits at all, much less to excess. It was for the jury to weigh all these circumstances, and to determine, in view of them all, whether he was habitually intemperate. [512]

There are very few decisions by courts of high character relating to this question. The principal one which has been brought to our attention is Insurance Co. v. Foley, 105 U. S. 350 [26: 1055]. In that case the insured, in answer to the question "Is the party of temperate habits; has he always been so?" answered "Yes," whereas, the defendant company alleged that in fact he was a man of intemperate habits. The court, through Mr. Justice Field, said:

"The question was as to the habits of the insured. His occasional use of intoxicating liquors did not render him a man of intemperate habits, nor would an occasional case of excess justify the application of this character to him. An attack of delirium tremens may sometimes follow a single excessive indulgence. * * * When we speak of the habits of a person we refer to his customary conduct, to pursue which he has acquired a tendency from frequent repetition of the same acts. It would be incorrect to say that a man has a habit of anything from a single act. * * * The court did not, therefore, err in instructing the jury that, if the habits of the insured, 'in the usual, ordinary, and everyday routine of his life, were temperate,' the representations made are not untrue, within the meaning of the policy, although he may have an attack of delirium tremens from an exceptional over indulgence. It could not have been contemplated, from the language used in the policy, that it should become void for an occasional excess by the insured, but only when such excess had by frequent repetitions become a habit. And the testimony of witnesses, who had been intimate with him for years, and knew his general habits, may well have satisfied the jury that, whatever excesses he may at times have committed, he was not habitually intemperate." [513]

We think this language eminently applicable to the case before us.

The questions presented by these requests do not rise to the dignity even of mixed law and fact, but are questions the answers to which are governed by no settled principle or rule of law, established either by statute or by a recognized course of judicial decision. They are emphatically questions of fact, which it is the province of a jury to decide, and in regard to which they are or ought to be as capable of making a decision as the court or anybody else.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore affirmed.

[176] WILLIAM H. M. SANGER, Appt.,
v.
WILLIAM NIGHTINGALE ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 176-186.)

Bill to foreclose mortgage—foreclosure of prior mortgage—collateral attack—Statute of Limitations—Georgia Act of March 16, 1869—construction of by Supreme Court of the State, followed—right to plead Statute of Limitations personal—fraud.

1. The right to plead the Statute of Limitations is a personal privilege of which the debtor can avail himself or not, as he may choose.
2. Section 6 of the Georgia Act of March 16, 1869, is held by this court, following the construction by the Supreme Court of Georgia, to be an ordinary Statute of Limitations.
3. The mortgagee of real estate in Georgia does not take the title to the property; and a mortgagee in that State, who is not in possession, cannot plead the Statute of Limitations as a defense to a debt secured by a prior incumbrance on the property.
4. In a proceeding to foreclose his own mortgage such mortgagee cannot set up the Statute of Limitations to set aside and annul the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, with proper parties before it, which foreclosed a mortgage prior in time and equal in equity to his, under which the property was sold and passed into other hands. The statute could have been pleaded, if at all, only in the former proceeding and by the mortgagor.
5. The charge in the present bill, that the proceeding to foreclose the prior mortgage, resulting in the transfer of title to the children of the mortgagor, was fraudulent, is held not to be sustained, though the transaction is not free from circumstances of suspicion. The original debt was a just debt. The decree was an honest decree, and the present complainant cannot complain of the disposition of the proceeds.

Argued and submitted April 15, 1887. Decided May 23, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Georgia. See, 4 Woods, 488. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Henry B. Tompkins, for appellant.

Messrs. A. R. Lawton and Rufus E. Lester, for appellees.

[177] Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Georgia.

The decree from which this appeal is taken dismissed a bill brought by William H. M. Sanger, the appellant, to foreclose a mortgage. The bill was brought against William Nightingale, as executor of Phineas M. Nightingale, his father, Mrs. Ellen D. Nightingale, the widow, and John K. Nightingale, and others, children of Phineas, deceased, the maker of the original mortgage.

Sanger, the plaintiff below, was a citizen of New York, and the other parties were mainly citizens of the State of Georgia.

This mortgage was made in the City of New York, on December 6, 1869, by Phineas M. Nightingale, who was a resident of Georgia. It conveyed to Sanger, the appellant, certain property in the State of Georgia, known as Camber's Island, in the Altamaha River. Three notes of $10,000 each accompanied the mortgage, payable respectively in one, two, and three years, with semi-annual interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum. It was to secure the payment of these notes that the mortgage was made, and it was duly recorded January 28, 1870, after having been properly acknowledged.

No money was ever paid upon this mortgage either by way of principal or interest. Nightingale, the mortgagor, died in April, 1878, and William Nightingale became the executor of his will.

There were several mortgages on this property prior to the one to the plaintiff, which were properly recorded so as to constitute notice to Sanger, as well as to all other subsequent purchasers or incumbrancers. When [178] Sanger came to file his bill to foreclose his mortgage, which he did April 8, 1883, it became necessary for him to bring these mortgages to the attention of the court. The principal, and only one of them, as the case presents itself to us, which is necessary to be considered, was one made by Nightingale, on January 30, 1855, to Charles Spalding, which included Camber's Island and a very large amount of landed estate beside, as well as some one hundred and twenty slaves residing upon the estate so mortgaged. This mortgage had been assigned, for the consideration of $100,000, by Spalding to Edmund Molyneux, who afterwards died, and his widow and heirs had removed to England. The executor of the estate of Molyneux had taken judgment against Nightingale before his death, for the sum due on the bonds secured by the mortgage to Spalding, and he had also foreclosed the mortgage of Nightingale to Spalding, the property had been sold, and a deed made by the sheriff under that sale to William Nightingale, son of Phineas.

All this occurred in the lifetime of the latter.

The bill of complaint of Sanger assails this proceeding by which the mortgage to Spalding was foreclosed, and the title of the property came into the hands of William, as the result of a fraudulent combination on the part of Phineas M. Nightingale, his debtor, and William Nightingale, as representing the children of Phineas M. Nightingale, Mrs. Molyneux, and the executor of Molyneux, to defraud him of his just claims under the mortgage of December, 1869. In reciting the means by which this fraud was carried out he says that Phineas M. Nightingale, the mortgagor in both mortgages, conveyed on July 21, 1870, to Mrs. Molyneux, the widow and real party in interest as heir or devisee of Molyneux, then dead, a tract of land known as "Dunginess," which was received by Mrs. Molyneux and intended by Nightingale to be a complete satisfaction of the Spalding mortgage. He further asserts that the Spalding bonds and mortgage were then turned over to P. M. Nightingale, either by a written assignment, or accompanied with an indorsement showing that they were satisfied; that P. M. Nightingale afterwards procured this mortgage to be foreclosed and Camber's Island sold under it and bought in by his son William without any consideration being paid for it, and solely for the purpose of cutting off the right of Sanger under his mortgage. [179]

The answer of the Nightingales denies this combination and fraud, and by way of explanation says that Dunginess was received by Mrs. Molyneux at the sum of $25,000 credited on the Spalding mortgage; that a question at that time existed as to how far the loss of the slaves who had been emancipated, which were included in the mortgage of Nightingale to Spalding, and the consideration of which was the land and negroes mortgaged, would be treated as a failure of consideration; that this question was also settled at the time that Dunginess was conveyed to Mrs. Molyneux, and that an adjustment of that matter was made by which, after the receipt of the deed of conveyance of Dunginess, it was agreed that the sum of $51,250 remained due upon that mortgage. They denied all combination to defeat the plaintiff in his mortgage; they asserted that the foreclosure of the mortgage was a bona fide attempt to enforce the collection of the remaining sum of $51,250, and that William Nightingale gave his note for the sum of $80,000, for which the property was sold.

The plaintiff afterwards filed an amended bill, in which he adopted the version of the settlement between Mrs. Molyneux and Phineas M. Nightingale, by which Dunginess was received as part payment only, and the mortgage was foreclosed for the remaining sum, after deduction for the loss of the slaves, the balance of the bonds remaining unpaid. But in regard to the foreclosure proceedings on that mortgage he says that, at the time they were instituted, the debt was barred by the Limitation Law of March 16, 1869, of the General Assembly of Georgia, and that at the time the bonds and mortgage on which that proceeding was instituted, were taken by the children of said Phineas M. Nightingale, by the assignment and transfer of the executor of the Molyneux estate, the said bonds and mortgage were all past due and barred by said Act of 1869.

[180] He further avers that the failure of said Phineas to plead the Statute of Limitations in bar of the foreclosure does not, and cannot, affect the right of the complainant to now avail himself of said Statute of Limitations. He then requests the court to decree the said foreclosure void, by virtue of said Limitation Law, against the claim and right of complainant.

Two questions are thus presented for consideration on the pleadings in the case. The first [183] of these may be said to be this plea of the Statute of Limitations; the second, the question of actual fraud in the foreclosure of the Spalding mortgage, and the transfer of title thereby to the children of Phineas M. Nightingale.

As regards the Statute of Limitations, it is observable that the foreclosure suit was brought in the name of Spalding, the original mortgagee, for the use of Johnston, administrator of the estate of Molyneux, for reasons explained by the attorneys who brought it. The suit was against Phineas M. Nightingale himself, who lived until the whole proceeding was ended and the property sold, and who died a few months afterwards. The proper, if not the only, time and place that this Statute of Limitations could have been pleaded was in that suit. Nightingale himself, who was the debtor and was in possession, had no equitable defense against the debt for which a judgment at law had been already obtained against him in one of the courts of Georgia, did not plead the Statute of Limitations. It would hardly be insisted by anybody that he was under any personal, legal or moral obligation to plead that statute. He had obtained from Mrs. Molyneux a very favorable settlement of a debt of over $100,000. Dunginess, which was accepted at the price of $25,000, is stated in the oral testimony to have been sold not long afterwards for $15,000. The value of the slaves was adjusted on some fair basis, and corresponding deduction was made on that account, so that the sum of $51,250, which was yet due on the mortgage, was in every sense an honorable and just debt which Nightingale owed to the estate of Molyneux, and a plea of the Statute of Limitations to that debt, if it could have been sustained after the payments made upon it, within the period of limitation, would have been an unjust exercise of his right to make such a plea which could only result in favor of the plaintiff Nightingale.

The right to plead the Statute of Limitations has been always held to be a personal privilege, of which the debtor could avail himself or not, as he might choose. See Pittman's Admrx. v. Elder, in the Supreme Court of Georgia, March Term, 1886.

It is true there are some authorities which go [184] to show that a purchaser with the legal title, whose right accrued subsequent to the debt which may be barred by the statute, can also avail himself of the statute when he is sued to foreclose this equity of redemption. While this proposition is not undisputed, the cases in which this privilege has been sustained by the courts of Georgia are those in which the party setting it up has become the owner of the title or the entire equity of redemption, or has been found in possession of the mortgaged property.

And in the case of Ewell v. Daggs, 108 U. S. 143 [27: 682], this court said that, though the subsequent purchaser might set up the plea of the statute, the plea must show that the action is barred as between the parties to the debt, because as the owner of the equity of redemption it is that debt he has to pay.

The Statute of Limitations applicable to this case is section 6 of the Act of March 16, 1869 (Pamph. Laws Ga. 1869, p. 133), which reads as follows:

"That all other actions upon contracts, express or implied, or upon any debt or liability whatsoever to the public, or a corporation, or a private individual or individuals, which accrued prior to 1st June, 1865, and are not now barred, shall be brought by 1st January, 1870, or both the right and right of action to enforce it shall be forever barred."

This being a law of the State of Georgia, we must follow its construction by the courts of that State, so far as it has been construed. It is said in the argument in this case, but not much insisted upon by the plaintiffs, that this is a peremptory discharge of the debt, and is not a mere Statute of Limitations, which, to be available, must be pleaded, as is the case with other limitation Acts. The proposition is that the statute in effect destroys the right of action; but this doctrine has been overruled repeatedly by the Supreme Court of Georgia, in which it has been held to be an ordinary Statute of Limitations. See George v. Gardner, 49 Ga. 441, 449; Harris v. Gray, 49 Ga. 585. In Parker v. Irwin, 47 Ga. 2, it was decided that the pleading of the statute was only a personal privilege of the debtor, and that to avail himself of the statute [185] he must plead it. See also Baker v. Bush, 25 Ga. 594.

The mortgagee of real estate in Georgia does not take the title to the property. The mortgage is only a security for the debt for which it is made. The title remains in the mortgagor. The cases in that State, as already intimated, go no further than to hold that a purchaser of the legal title, or possibly a mortgagee in possession, may when sued, plead the Statute of Limitation as a defense to a prior debt, or mortgage, or incumbrance, made by the holder of the legal title.

In the case before us Sanger never had the possession, never had the legal title, and, as he was no party to the foreclosure proceedings, which he now contests, he simply stands upon such rights as his mortgage lien gives him against Nightingale. It is difficult to see from what standpoint he, in this suit, in which he is complainant, seeking to foreclose his own mortgage, can set up the Statute of Limitation, not as a defense, for he is not sued and nobody is troubling him about his claim, but as a positive weapon to set aside and annul in this collateral proceeding the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, with proper parties before it, which foreclosed a mortgage prior in time and equal in equity to his, under which the property was sold and passed into other lands. Certainly the court which rendered that decree had jurisdiction of the property and of Nightingale, the defendant, who was in possession, and who had the legal title. It is equally as certain that whether Nightingale ought to have pleaded the statute or not, he did not do so, and it is now too late to set it up as a defense to that suit. If Nightingale himself had made that plea, it is difficult to perceive how he could have avoided the effect of part payment by the transfer of Dungineas and an acknowledgment of the debt by the settlement under which it was adjusted at $51,250, as a sufficient answer to the plea of the Statute of Limitations. We suppose, though no authorities are cited on the subject, that the law of Georgia, like that of other States, admits of such evidence as payment, acknowledgment of the debt, and agreement to [186] pay, as being a sufficient reply to the Statute of Limitations. How Nightingale could have pleaded the statute successfully under such circumstances we do not see. In short, we see no way, in accordance with any known principles of dealing with the Statute of Limitations, that the plaintiff can, in this collateral proceeding, make use of the statute as a positive weapon of attack to set aside a decree rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, with proper parties before it, under which the title has passed by a judicial sale to third persons.

In regard to the other proposition, that the whole proceeding was the result of a fraudulent combination to cut off and defeat the claim of the plaintiff, we have a little more difficulty.

There are many circumstances of suspicion
1 the transaction. There is no very satisfac-ry account of anything being paid by the ightingales for the purchase of Camber's
Island under that decree of foreclosure. There is no very clear account of how the bonds and mortgage, under which that decree was made, came into the possession of William Nightingale and his brothers and sisters. When the purchase was made, William Nightingale gave his note for $30,000, payable to the order of the attorneys who foreclosed the mortgage. It is nowhere shown that this note was ever paid. It is not claimed that it was ever paid in fact; nor is it shown what became of it. It is stated by the attorneys that the mortgage was foreclosed in the name of Spalding, for the use of George H. Johnston, administrator of Edward Molyneux, and that the note for the purchase money was taken to the solicitors as a means of distributing it to those who might be entitled to it. The attorneys seem to have been satisfied that the transfer of the original mortgage and bonds to the Nightingales, the children of Phineas M. Nightingale, extinguished this note; and if there were any clear and satisfactory account of how the junior Nightingales became possessed of the bonds and mortgage this might explain the whole matter.

The attempt to do this is rather a lame affair. It is said that the title of Phineas M. Nightingale to Dungineas was brought into doubt by an examination of some papers under which he held it; which raised a question whether he had anything more than a life estate in that property, the title of which after his death descended [187] to his children, and therefore Mrs. Molyneux would have no title to Dungineas when he died. A paper is produced which professes to be a quitclaim conveyance by the children of Nightingale to Mrs. Molyneux. This conveyance is set up as the consideration on which Mrs. Molyneux, or the administrator of her husband's estate, transferred the remaining part of the debt due on the original mortgage to the children of Phineas M. Nightingale.

But it must be confessed that the whole of this proposition is involved in obscurity. Where this paper came from, whether it was ever delivered to anybody, or how it came to be executed, are questions which are wholly unexplained by any part of the paper or by anybody who seems to know anything about it. If the other defenses to the charges of fraud and conspiracy in the foreclosure of the Spalding mortgage and the purchase of the estate were not better sustained than this, we should be very much inclined to reverse the decree on that branch of the subject. But it is very clear that the settlement and adjustment by which the elder Nightingale conveyed Dungineas at a consideration of $25,000 to Mrs. Molyneux, and by which an adjustment was at the same time made of the claim for the failure of consideration by reason of the emancipation of the slaves, and the sum of $51,250 found to be due and unpaid on the mortgage, was a fair and honest transaction; nor is anything to be found which impeaches the proceedings for the foreclosure of the mortgage for the remainder of the debt. The proceedings in this case were fair and open and according to the laws of the State of Georgia. Nothing hindered the attorneys who conducted these proceedings from accepting William's note for $30,000 as a proper consideration for the purchase money and for the sheriff's deed, which was made to him. It is nowhere asserted that the property was worth more than this $30,000. Up to this point there is no reason to complain of any improper exercise of power on the part of the owners of the mortgage, or of the conduct and proceedings for its foreclosure in the courts of Georgia.

[133] Now, whatever arrangement may have afterwards been made between Mrs. Molyneux, or the administrator of the Molyneux estate, and the Nightingales, by which this note was either satisfied by the quitclaim conveyances referred to of Dunginess, or was absolutely remitted as a gratuity to the children of the senior Nightingale, is a matter of which Sanger had no right to complain. The debt was a just debt. The decree was an honest decree, and the proceeds of it belonged to the estate of Molyneux, either to the widow, the administrator, or devisees, if there was a will.

It is stated here, and it seems the most probable solution of the matter, that, in addition to this quitclaim of the heirs of Nightingale of Dunginess, Mrs. Molyneux, who was the principal if not the sole devisee under her husband's will, had become attached to the family of the Nightingales while they resided in this country, and was willing that the debt due to her should be used as a means of securing to the children the family homestead. She had a right to do this. It was her property. She had the right to select whether she would give it to Sanger or to these children. In no event, that we can see, was Sanger injured by the transaction. If, however, he had any right to complain, if there was any wrong done him, it was not in the proceedings by which the decree was obtained, and that decree must be held to remain valid under all circumstances.

If Sanger had brought his bill to merely set aside the sale under that decree, and proposed to redeem or pay the amount of the decree, there might be some reason to consider his claim, because up to the rendition of the decree everything was fair and right. If the sale was set aside, the decree would remain; and he could not under such a bill do anything but pay the money due on that decree, and then proceed to sell for his own debt. This he does not seem to have contemplated; perhaps for the reason that the property is not worth the debt, or half the debt for which that decree was rendered.

On the whole case we are of opinion that the decree of the Circuit Court must be affirmed.

FRANK S. MOODY ET AL., Assignees in Bankruptcy of BAUGH, KENNEDY & Co. ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 132-138.)

Bankruptcy—bill by assignees to set aside deed by bankrupt to his daughter as an advancement—absence of fraud.

An assignee in bankruptcy cannot maintain a bill to set aside a deed made by the bankrupt as an advancement to his daughter, on the occasion of her marriage, without fraud or intent to defraud his creditors, the grantor being at the time in prosperous circumstances, and having left ample resources with which to pay all indebtedness.

Submitted April 22, 1887. Decided May 23, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Alabama. Reversed, Remanded.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. John T. Morgan, for appellants:

The conveyances annulled by section 14 of the Bankrupt Act are such as are made "by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors;" not such as defraud others who are not creditors, nor such as defraud certain creditors, and being honest in fact and intent, are valid as to all other creditors; nor such as are not affected with any fraud or covin, and are good between the parties.

As the assignee holds the same legal relation to every creditor who may prove his debt, and is the representative alike of all of them to collect and distribute the estate of the bankrupt, a fraudulent conveyance by the bankrupt, which the assignee can disregard, is one that is void as to all persons who belong to the class of creditors of the bankrupt. All conveyances tainted with actual fraud are void by statute, as it respects certain persons, and are good as to all others.

The law does not by its own operation make these deeds void, so as to vest the property conveyed by them in the assignee of a bankrupt. Stewart v. Platt, 101 U. S. 731 (25: 816).

The definition by this court of the rights which pass to the assignee of a bankrupt do not seem to include rights as unsubstantial as those set up in the bill of complaint in this case. Stewart v. Platt, supra; Dudley v. Easton, 104 U. S. 103 (26: 669); Yeatman v. Savings Inst. 95 U. S. 766 (24: 590); McHenry v. La Société Française, Id. 58 (24: 370); Hauselt v. Harrison, 105 U. S. 406 (26: 1076).

Messrs. M. L. Woods and William S. Thorington, for appellees:

A voluntary deed is void as to existing creditors, independent of all motives of fraud, and independent of the condition of the grantor as to solvency.

Cato v. Easley, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 214; Miller v. Thompson, 3 Port. (Ala.) 196; Moore v. Spence, 6 Ala. 506; Thomas v. Degraffenreid, 17 Ala. 602; Foote v. Cobb, 18 Ala. 585; Gannard v. Eslava, 20 Ala. 782; Stiles v. Lightfoot, 26 Ala. 443; McAnally v. O'Neal, 56 Ala. 299; Hubbard v. Allen, 59 Ala. 283; Anderson v. Anderson, 64 Ala. 403.

The case last cited contains a full and clear exposition of the law of Alabama on this subject. These authorities leave no room for doubt as to the settled law of Alabama and the law of Alabama governs in this case.

There are two reasons why this court will follow the Alabama decisions on this subject. The first is that these decisions are a construction of a state statute, section 2124, Code of Alabama; and the federal courts will adopt the construction given to a state statute by the highest court of the State. Pratt v. Curtis, 6 Bank. Reg. 142; Thatcher v. Powell, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 119 (5: 221); Polk's Lessee v. Wendal, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 87 (3: 665);

Elmendorf v. Taylor, 35 U. S. 10 Wheat. 152 (6: 289).

In the next place the decisions of Alabama on this subject have become a rule of property in that State; and in such cases the federal courts, sitting there, will apply the rule as though they were state courts.

Lloyd v. Fulton, 91 U. S. 485 (23: 365); Christy v. Pridgeon, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 196 (18: 322).

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity, filed in the District Court of the United States for the Middle District of Alabama, on the 25th of July, 1878, by Frank S. Moody and Richard C. McLester, as assignees in bankruptcy of Baugh, Kennedy & Co. and John S. Kennedy against John S. Kennedy and his wife, Mary E. Kennedy, and Edward Warren and his wife, Vernon L. Warren. The bill alleges that, on the 7th of July, 1876, the defendant John S. Kennedy, as one of the partners in the late firm of Baugh, Kennedy & Co., and as an individual, was adjudged a bankrupt by the said district court, on a petition filed by that firm and each of its individual members; that the plaintiffs were appointed on July 28, 1876, assignees in bankruptcy of the estate, rights and credits of the firm, and of each of its individual members, including the defendant Kennedy; that they received the usual assignment from the register in bankruptcy, on the 11th of August, 1876; that, on the 31st of December, 1866, Kennedy and his wife were seised and possessed of a tract of land in Sumpter County, Alabama, containing 1,056 acres; that, on that day, without any other consideration than that of natural love and affection, they undertook to convey the land to their daughter, the de- [133] fendant Vernon L. Warren, but the deed was not acknowledged by the grantors until the 7th of October, 1867, and was not recorded until the 29th of March, 1872; that, as the deed had no attesting witnesses, it did not become operative as a deed of conveyance, as against existing creditors, for any purpose, until the date of its recording, or at least until it was acknowledged; that none of the defendants have been in the actual possession of the land since the date of the deed; that, at the time the deed was executed, Kennedy owed six debts, which are specified in detail in the bill, and amount in the aggregate to $6,442.62, four of them, amounting to $4,871.92, having been proved in bankruptcy, two of those proved having been due to two minors, wards of Kennedy, named Harrison, and one of those not proved having been due to a Mrs. Herbert, and three of the debts having been due by the said firm, of which he was a member.

The bill alleges that the said deed, being wholly voluntary, was, under the laws of Alabama, absolutely void, as against those debts and as against the plaintiffs, who, as such assignees, represent those debts for the purposes of this suit. The bill prays that the deed may be declared null and void and be set aside and vacated, and that the land may be sold by the plaintiffs, and its proceeds be administered by them as part of the estate of Kennedy in bankruptcy.

The deed, a copy of which is annexed to the bill, sets forth that it is made "in consideration of the love and affection we bear to our daughter, Vernon L. Warren, and the sum of ten dollars." It conveys the land to her and to her heirs and assigns forever, and contains a covenant of warranty and this clause: "The foregoing conveyance is intended as an advancement to our said daughter."

The answer of Kennedy and his wife avers that love and affection for their daughter was part of the consideration for the conveyance, and that the sum of $10 was also paid as part of the consideration, as stated in the deed; that the defendant Warren and his wife were married on the 20th of December, 1866; that the deed was executed and delivered to the daughter on the day it bears date; that the daughter and her husband took immediate and [134] actual possession of the land; that the husband rented the land for the year beginning January 1, 1867; that he has had the sole control and management of the land, as agent and husband of his wife, paying taxes thereon, directing and superintending the repairs, and receiving the entire rent thereof for his wife, from the date of the deed to the day of making the answer, April 21, 1879; and that Warren and his wife are still in the actual possession of the land. The answer avers that all the debts of any moment which Kennedy owed at the date of the deed, on his own individual account, being the debts to the two minors, and the debt to Mrs. Herbert, amounted to nearly $3,400; that the same debts were substantially all the debts he owed at the date of his bankruptcy, on his own private account; and that, as a member of the old firm of Baugh, Kennedy & Co., he owed, at the time of making the deed and at the date of his bankruptcy, jointly with his partners, debts amounting to about $3,071.

The answer avers that the deed was not made with the intent to hinder, delay or defraud the creditors named in the bill, or any other creditors, or that it necessarily did so; that, at the time of making the conveyance, Kennedy and his wife were in prosperous circumstances, and possessed of ample means to pay all debts, and were able to withdraw the value of their donation to their daughter from their estate without the least hazard to their creditors; that they owed, in their individual capacity, at that time, very little money, the debts above named in the answer, amounting to nearly $3,400, being their chief and almost their only individual debts; that, at the time of making the deed, Kennedy owned, in his own right, free from all liens or incumbrances, real and personal property and choses in action, a schedule of which is annexed to the answer, amounting in value at that date to $91,400; that he was never sued for an individual debt, and never gave any incumbrances on his property, until some twelve months before his failure; and that he would long since have paid the three individual debts due to the minors and Mrs. Herbert, but the last named debt was so fixed by will that Mrs. Herbert could only use the interest during [135] her life, and, at her death, without heirs, she being childless, the property was to go back to other parties, and the two minors were under age until three or four years before the filing of the answer, and could not lawfully receive the money.

The answer of the defendants Warren and wife adopts, as their answer, the answer of Kennedy and his wife, and pleads the facts set forth in the latter answer, as a bar to the plaintiff's suit. There was a replication to these answers, and three witnesses were examined on behalf of the plaintiffs. The only point of any materiality in their testimony is as to the value of the property in December, 1866, which one of them puts at $6 an acre, another at from $8 to $10 an acre, and the third knows nothing about.

In June, 1880, the solicitors for the plaintiffs signed a stipulation, entitled in the suit, admitting "that the facts set forth in the answers are substantially true, except so far as controverted by the depositions and other evidence in the cause."

The case was brought to a hearing on the pleadings and the three depositions: the deed to Mrs. Warren, the stipulation, and the schedule to the answers of the defendants; and the district court on the 9th of July, 1880, made a decree setting aside the deed, and directing that the land covered by it be sold by the plaintiffs as assignees in bankruptcy, and that the net proceeds of the sale be held by the assignees subject to distribution among the creditors of the bankrupt under the orders and directions of the district court, according to the respective rights and priorities of such creditors and of the defendants Warren and his wife. The decree also referred it to a master to ascertain and report the amounts due from Kennedy on the several demands set forth in the bill, and which should, up to the time of holding the reference, have been proved against the estate of Kennedy in bankruptcy. The defendants Warren and wife appealed from that decree to the circuit court, which, in December, 1881, affirmed the decree of the district court, from which latter decree Warren and his wife have appealed to this court.

[136] It will be noticed that the bill does not attack the deed on the ground of fraud. It does not allege that it was made with any intent to delay, hinder, or defraud the creditors named in the bill, or any other creditors of Kennedy. It does not allege that there are any other credit-[137] ors than those named in the bill, or any creditors who became such after the making of the deed. The sole ground on which it proceeds is that the deed was a voluntary deed, and is void as against the persons who were creditors of Kennedy prior to the making of the deed. It claims that the plaintiffs, as assignees in bankruptcy, represent the debts of those creditors, for the purposes of the suit.

The alleged right of action of the plaintiffs is asserted under section 14 of the Bankruptcy Act of March 2, 1867, chap. 176, 14 Stat. at L. 522, which provides that "all the property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors" "shall, in virtue of the adjudication of bankruptcy and the appointment of his assignee, be at once vested in such assignee, and he may sue for and recover the said estate, debts, and effects." This provision is also found in sections 5046 and 5047 of the Revised Statutes.

The deed in question was a valid instrument between the grantors and the grantees. The stipulation on which the case was heard, containing an admission "that the facts set forth in the answers are substantially true, except so far as controverted by the depositions and other evidence in the cause," makes the allegations of fact contained in the answer of Kennedy and his wife evidence in the cause. When the deed was made, Kennedy was, as the answer alleges, in prosperous circumstances, and possessed of ample means to pay all debts, and was able to withdraw the value of the donation to his daughter from his estate, without the least hazard to his creditors; and the amount of his individual debts was very small as compared with the amount of his property. The deed of the daughter being honest in fact and in intent, and being, on the evidence, a proper provision for her, as an advancement on the occasion of her marriage, and being valid as between her parents and herself, and no fraud in fact, or intent to commit a fraud, or to hinder or delay creditors, being alleged in the bill, the case is not one in which these plaintiffs can set aside the deed, as being a deed of "property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors," even though the conveyance may have been invalid, under the Statute of Alabama, as against the creditors named in the bill, because it was a voluntary conveyance. Those creditors, whatever remedies they may have had to collect their debts, are not represented by the plaintiffs, as assignees in bankruptcy, for the purposes of this suit, on the facts developed. [138]

The case of Pratt v. Curtis, 2 Lowell, 87, cited by the plaintiffs, was a case of two bills in equity by the assignee of a bankrupt to set aside conveyances of land made by the bankrupt, one being a voluntary deed of settlement for the benefit of his children, and the other being a like deed for the benefit of his wife. Each bill alleged that, at the time of the settlement, the bankrupt was indebted to persons who were still his creditors, and was embarrassed in his circumstances, and that the deed was made with intent to delay and defraud his creditors. On demurrer, the bill was sustained, on the view that the assignee in bankruptcy; and he only, had the right to impeach the deeds, in the interest of creditors. That decision, based on a case of intent to delay and defraud creditors, on the part of a person embarrassed in his circumstances, has no application to the present case.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded to it, with a direction to dismiss the bill, with costs to the defendants in the Circuit Court and in the District Court.

Contracts—construction—practical interpretation by parties, followed—rescission—infringement of patent.

1. In the construction of a contract, where the language used by the parties is indefinite or ambiguous, and of doubtful construction, the practical interpretation by the parties themselves is entitled to great, if not controlling, influence.

2. Upon a bill to restrain the alleged infringement of a patent, it is held: that a certain contract between the parties, by virtue of which the defendant is entitled to use the improvements covered by said patent, without royalty and without being charged with liability as an infringer, continued in force, notwithstanding a certain attempt made by the complainants to rescind it for an alleged failure of consideration; and that if there were any doubt or ambiguity arising upon the words employed in said contract they would be effectually removed by the practical construction by the parties.

Argued May 3, 4, 1887. Decided May 23, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio.

Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Henry S. Sherman and W. Bakewell, for appellants.

Messrs. W. W. Boynton, M. D. Leggett and S. Burke, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants, complainants below, on the 28th of February, 1880, filed their bill in equity to restrain the alleged infringement by the defendant of letters patent No. 166950, granted August 24, 1875, to John A. Topliff, for a new and useful improvement in bow sockets for buggy tops. As stated in the specification, "This invention has relation to bow sockets for buggy tops, and consists in placing a filling of wood in the tubes of the bow sockets to strengthen the same; also in extending the strip of steel which is inserted in the wood filling far enough down to enable it to be welded or otherwise fastened to the slat iron."

Among other grounds of defense, the defendant in his answer sets out the following: He alleges that some time prior to the 2[illegible] day of December, 1870, he invented a new and useful invention denominated an improvement in carriage bows, consisting in the main in constructing the straight part of carriage bows out of tapering tubes made of sheet iron with soldered seams and lower ends flattened, forming a part of the hinge, in conjunction with the bows made of wood, shaped and fitted into the upper ends of the tubes; that this invention was secured to him by letters patent dated December 27, 1870, No 110518; that this patent was reissued as reissued letters patent No. 9026, January 6, 1880; and that he obtained another patent, No. 114885, dated May 16, 1871, for a new and improved carriage bow cover and slat iron combined. That soon after he invented his first improvement in carriage bows, for which he obtained the patent dated December 27, 1870; and pending the application therefor, a contract in writing was entered into on or about the first day of September, 1870, between himself and the complainants, as follows:

"This agreement, made and concluded this —— day of ——— A. D. 1870, by and between Isaac N. Topliff, of the first part, and John A. Topliff and George H. Ely, of the second part, witnesseth: 1. The said party of the first part [123] is the sole owner of a certain patent for tubular iron bows used in manufacturing carriage and buggy tops, which patent was issued the —— day of ———, A. D. ———. Now, in consideration of the agreements of said party of the second part to be by them performed, the said party of the first part hereby gives, grants, sells and conveys to the said party of the second part, the exclusive right of manufacturing and of selling the above mentioned article throughout the United States, for five years from the date of this agreement; it being understood that, at the expiration of five years the said party of the first part shall have the right to have the above named articles manufactured at not more than two other places, to be sold at prices adopted by said party of the second part, but in all other respects the rights and privileges of the said party of the second part shall continue during the entire life of the patent.

"2. The parties mutually agree that they will share the expense of maintaining the right of the patent against infringements and other patents in the following proportion: the first party to pay one third and the second party to pay two thirds. It is also further agreed that any improvement made on these articles by either party shall be for the mutual benefit of the parties.

"3. In consideration of the above grant the said party of the second part hereby agrees to pay to the said party of the first part 15 per cent on the wholesale selling prices of above named articles, as royalty on all sold by them, it being understood that these prices shall at all times be settled by mutual agreement between both parties. The said party of the second part further agree that they will advertise thoroughly the above named article in such ways as may seem best, and do all in their power to introduce and extend the sale of said articles. They also agree that they will make them of quality and finish to meet the approbation of said party of the first part.

"I. N. TOPLIFF. [SEAL.]
"J. A. TOPLIFF. [SEAL.]
"GEORGE H. ELY. [SEAL.]"

That, in pursuance of this agreement, the [124] complainants entered upon the manufacture and sale of carriage bows, the defendant being in their employment as traveling salesman, and as such devoted his time largely to the introduction and sale of said carriage bows throughout the United States, and also his time, thought and attention to making improvements therein, knowledge of which was communicated by him to the complainants from time to time. That some of these improvements made by him were covered by the patent bearing date May 16, 1871. That the business was carried on by the complainants in this way under said contract for more than eight years, to their great gain and profit.

The defendant further alleges that "After the issuing to him of the last mentioned letters patent, he made some slight changes and improvements in the manufacture of carriage bows, and communicated the same to said complainants, especially to said John, and requested that, in the manufacture of carriage bows under his patent aforesaid, the said complainants should construct and manufacture them in accordance with his said suggestions and improvements, which improvements were communicated by this defendant to the said complainants on or about the first day of June, 1878. That thereupon his said suggestion and invention was adopted by the said complainants in the manufacture of carriage bows by the said complainants; and afterwards the said John A Topliff, for the purpose of securing the same to the complainants and to this defendant for their mutual use and benefit, in accordance with the terms of said contract, made application for a patent thereon, and secured the alleged patent in the complainants bill of complaint described. And this defendant alleges and says that, if in reality there is anything new or useful embraced in the said letters patent, issued to the said John A. Topliff, that he was and is the true inventor and rightful owner thereof; and that the said John A. Topliff was not and is not the true and original inventor and discoverer thereof. And this defendant alleges that whether said patent, so issued in the name of said complainants, is or is not valid, that he, by the terms of his said contract entered into with said complainants, is entitled [125] to use the same to the same extent that the complainants are entitled to use the same. That, by the terms of said contract, such right is expressly granted and conveyed to him, and that the complainants have so interpreted said contract, and have had upon their part the free use and benefit of the invention, discovery, and improvement made by this defendant and secured to him by letters patent dated May 16, 1871, as aforesaid, and other considerations therefor, as agreed; and that, relying upon said contract, he communicated to the said complainants the information and instructions in regard to manufacturing under his said patents and other improvements above named, upon which the said John A. Topliff made the application and secured to the said complainants the letters patent said to be owned by them. And this defendant denies that he has made other use of the letters patent issued to the complainants than such as he was authorized to make by the terms of the contract aforesaid between the complainants and himself."

The defendant further says that he has established a manufactory of carriage bows in the City of Cleveland, but not in any other place or places; and that by the terms of his contract with the complainants he is entitled so to do, and in said business to use the alleged improvements covered by the patent described in the bill.

The case was heard on the pleadings and proofs when, the circuit court being satisfied that under the contract set up in the answer each party had a right to use, without the payment of royalty, the patent issued to the complainants, a decree was entered dismissing the bill. The complainants took the present appeal.

It is now contended, on the part of the appellants: 1, that at the time when the bill was filed the contract set up in the answer was not in force, having been previously rescinded by the parties; and 2, that if the contract is in force, it does not secure to the appellee the right to the use of the improvement covered by the patent to John A. Topliff of August 24, 1875, belonging to the appellants.

The circumstances which, according to the contention of the appellants, constitute the rescission of the contract are claimed to be as [126] follows:

They allege that when the contract in question was entered into, the application of the appellee for his patent was pending; that a sample specimen of the carriage bow intended to be covered by the patent was shown by the appellee to the appellants; that the appellee represented to them that the patent would cover the use of tubular carriage bows; that in point of fact the original application made the following claims:

"1. The upright part of carriage bows, constructed of tubular sheet metal A, in combination with the wooden bow B, put together in the manner and for the purposes set forth and described.

"2. The tube A, with elongated flat portion c, to form a solid joint with the bow socket D in the manner described.

"3. The scallop edged sheet iron bow socket D to be used in connection with the tubes A and A', in the manner described."

That these claims were rejected in the Patent Office, and in lieu of them the claim of the patent as issued on December 27, 1870, was substituted, as follows:

"The straight part of the bow A, tubular and flattened at the lower end, the bow socket D, consisting of two concave scalloped pieces, and the bent part of the bow B, all combined, constructed, and arranged as and for the purposes set forth"

That the appellants were not aware of the rejection of the original claims until some time in the year 1879; that during that period they acted under the impression that they were secured in the exclusive right to use carriage bows containing the tubular uprights, that they had no knowledge to the contrary until the fact was disclosed by an examination of the records of the Patent Office; that immediately upon discovering it they gave notice to the appellee that the consideration for the contract between them had thus failed, the patent being of no avail to them, and that they would no longer regard it as obligatory, and that thereupon the appellee acquiesced in this rescission of the contract by them, and resumed his ownership of the original patent, surrendered the same, and obtained a reissue thereof on January 6, 1880, the claims of which are as follows:

"1. A carriage bow, the side or upright portions A A of which are tubular, substantially as and for the purpose shown.

"2. A carriage bow consisting of the bent wooden section B and the tubular sections A A, the latter constituting the vertical sides or arms of the bow; the opposite ends of the bent por- [127] tion B being secured to the upper ends of the tubular sections A A, substantially as set forth.

"3. A carriage bow consisting of the bent wooden sections B and the metallic tubular sections A A, the latter constituting the straight or vertical sides of the bow, substantially as set forth.

"4. A carriage bow consisting of the bent wooden section B and the tubular sections A A, the latter constituting the straight or vertical sides of the bow, and constructed at their lower ends to be attached to a socket or carriage seat, substantially as set forth."

On the other hand, it appears from the testimony in the case, that the manufacture of the carriage bows, as contemplated under the application for the original patent, was abandoned by the parties before the patent was in fact issued, experience showing that the bows so made were not practically useful in the trade; that the original patent of December 27, 1870, soon after it was issued, was delivered to the appellants, and kept in their possession until it was lost or destroyed in December, 1878, and that thereby they had abundant opportunity of knowing, from an examination of its contents, the actual extent of its claims; and that subsequently a patent of May 16, 1871, was issued to the appellee for a new and improved carriage bow cover and slat iron combined, which embodied important improvements on the carriage bow as previously made.

Under this patent all the parties continued to carry on the business of making and selling carriage bows, the articles of manufacture being from time to time improved and rendered more valuable and salable by the suggestion and adoption of improvements made from time to time by both parties. To cover some of the improvements thus invented and adopted, the [128] appellant, John A. Topliff, applied for and obtained his patent of August 24, 1875. The claims of that patent are as follows:

"1. In combination with the back tubes of bow sockets and wood bows or fillings, a steel or other hard metal plate, welded or otherwise fastened within the tube to the slat iron, substantially as and for the purpose specified.

"2. The combination, with the metal tubes of bow sockets, of a wooden filling, substantially as and for the purpose set forth."

John A. Topliff states, as a witness in the case, that his improvement consisted "in placing a filling of wood in the tubes of the bow sockets to strengthen the same, and also in extending the strip of steel, which is inserted in the wood filling, far enough down to enable it to be welded or otherwise fastened to the slat iron." After the issue of this patent, the business was continued by the parties as before, the carriage bows and bow sockets being made with all the improvements added; the appellants continuing regularly to account to the appellee, according to the terms of the contract between them, for his share of the proceeds of the sales of the manufactured articles, being 15 per cent of the wholesale selling prices of all actually sold. These sums amounted in the aggregate to $40,000 or $50,000, and the payments were made regularly until in August or September, 1879.

In reference to John A. Topliff's patent of August 24, 1875, the appellee claimed that the idea of a wooden filling in the tubes of the bow sockets was suggested by him, and that of welding the steel plate to the slat iron was suggested by his brother. On that point he says in his testimony:

"Some time in 1874 or 1875, I think it was, I came home, and my brother said that they had concluded to patent that device of welding the steel to the slat iron, and he said that he thought that they had better take out a patent or make one claim for the filling also. I told him that the filling, of course, was my improvement, and I did not know that it would be right to insert it into his patent. He said it would make no difference, as our contract would cover it all. He said that it would make no difference which took out the patent, whether it was in his name or my name, and I made [129] no further objection to it; but I always claimed, and he never disputed it at that time, that the device was mine as far as the filling was concerned."

This statement of the appellee as a witness is not contradicted by the testimony of either John A. Topliff or George H. Ely, the appellants, the only other witnesses examined in the cause.

In 1879 the appellee left the employment of the appellants, and made preparations to establish a business of his own in the manufacture of carriage bows and bow sockets in Cleveland, claiming the right to do so under the terms of his contract, when the present controversy arose between them. In explanation of their continuing to pay royalty under the contract as late as in 1879, John A. Topliff states in his testimony, as follows:

"We paid royalty from the fact that we supposed that we were working under his original patent; we did not know to the contrary. The original patent was somewhere, perhaps, in our office, and was burned up in 1878, I think —I think that was the time of the fire—and we had not seen it for a long time, and supposed that we were working under the original patent until we finally received the file wrappers from Washington informing us to the contrary; and when we received them, together with the patent, we found out that we were not working under his patent and refused to pay further royalty."

This explanation cannot be accepted. It is inconsistent with the facts testified to by the same witness, as well as others, that the manufacture of the bows and bow sockets under the original patent ceased early in 1870, before, in fact, that patent was issued; and that the business was actually carried on under Isaac N. Topliff's patent of May 16, 1871, and the subsequent improvements patented to John A. Topliff under the patent of August 24, 1875. The fact, therefore, that the patent of December 27, 1870, was of no practical value in the business was well known and perfectly understood from a very early period in its prosecution, and the patent of May 16, 1871, was accepted by the parties as a substitute for it. [130] The appellants, therefore, cannot claim that they made the first discovery of its inutility in 1879, and had a right by reason thereof to rescind the contract for a failure of consideration. It was equally immaterial that Isaac N. Topliff subsequently thereto, in 1880, surrendered that patent, and obtained the reissue. If the reissue is void, the situation of the parties is not changed; if it is valid and useful it inures to the benefit of the appellants as well as to that of the appellee, by virtue of the express terms of the agreement between them.

The second proposition of the appellants is that if the contract set up in the answer is in force, it does not secure to the appellee the right to the use of the improvement covered by the patent sued on. The language of the agreement is this: "It is also further agreed that any improvement made on these articles by either party shall be for the mutual benefit of the parties."

It is contended by the appellants that the articles referred to in this clause of the contract are those mentioned in the former part of the agreement as meaning articles to be manufactured under the original patent of Isaac N. Topliff of December 27, 1870, and that the improvement which is to inure, by virtue of the clause quoted, to the mutual benefit of the parties must be an improvement upon the patented article. This, however, it seems to us, is too narrow and restricted a meaning to be placed on the language of the parties, and fails to secure their actual intention. The subject of the contract is the manufacture and sale of bows and bow sockets for carriage and buggy tops, in which the parties were to have mutual interests, as defined in the contract. It was supposed, and this undoubtedly was the original basis of the agreement, that the appellee had secured the exclusive right to a valuable improvement in the manufacture of this description of articles. His application for the patent was then pending; the patent was in fact subsequently issued. In the meantime the article as proposed was manufactured and put on sale, and ascertained by experience not sufficiently to answer the purpose. By mutual suggestion and assent improvements in the manufacture were adopted, and some of them [131] embraced in the second patent to the appellee of May 16, 1871. The article made under that patent was treated as the article intended by the contract. Other improvements were subsequently devised and adopted for perfecting the same article, and these were embraced in the patent to John A. Topliff of August 24, 1875. The operations of the parties in the manufacture and sale of the article were carried on, and continued to enlarge and prosper, and became profitable; and the parties throughout acted upon the assumption and understanding that the article thus manufactured was the article contemplated by the contract between them. If there were any doubt or ambiguity arising upon the words employed in the clause of the contract under consideration they would be effectually removed by this practical construction continuously put upon them by the conduct of the parties for so long a period.

"In cases where the language used by the parties to the contract is indefinite or ambiguous, and hence of doubtful construction, the practical interpretation of the parties themselves is entitled to great, if not controlling, influence. The interest of each generally leads him to a construction most favorable to himself; and when the difference has become serious and beyond amicable adjustment, it can be settled only by the arbitrament of the law. But in an executory contract, and where its execution necessarily involves a practical construction, if the minds of both parties concur, there can be no great danger in the adoption of it by the court as the true one." Chicago v. Sheldon, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 50, 54 [19: 594, 596], per Mr. Justice Nelson.

In our opinion, the contract between the parties set up in the answer continued in force, notwithstanding what was done by the appellants in 1879 with the intention to put an end to it; and, by virtue of its terms, the appellee is entitled to manufacture, in Cleveland, carriage bows and bow sockets, using therein the combinations covered by the patent to John A. Topliff of August 24, 1875, without royalty, and without being charged with liability as an infringer.

The decree of the Circuit Court in dismissing the bill, which is its whole legal effect, was therefore right, and is hereby affirmed.

LIZZIE TUTTLE, Admrx. of ORSON TUTTLE, Deceased, Plff. in Err.,

v.

DETROIT, GRAND HAVEN AND MILWAUKEE RAILWAY COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. ——.)

Master and servant—latter assumes risks of employment—contributory negligence—railroads—curves in side track.

1. Where one enters the service of another in a particular employment he assumes the risks incident to such employment.

2. The courts are not required to restrict the right of a railroad company to construct its side tracks in its freight depots and yards with such curves as it may deem expedient and proper.

3. In the case presented, it is held: that the plaintiff's intestate entered the employment of the defendant as a brakeman with full knowledge of the form of the defendant's side tracks, the construction of its cars, and the hazards incident to the service; that he assumed the risks of such employment; that he was guilty of contributory negligence, and that the court below properly directed a verdict for the defendant.

Argued and submitted April 4, 1887. Decided May 23, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. O. M. Springer and F. A. Baker, for plaintiff in error:

It was the duty of the defendant to construct and keep in repair a proper, sufficient and safe roadbed and track; and it is liable to an employee for negligence in the performance of this duty.

In the case at bar, it was apparent that there was quite a sharp curve, but that it was so very sharp or irregular that the draw heads would pass each other, could only be known by actual experiment, or by the use of instruments. The defect was a latent one in every sense of the word.

But even if the deceased had known of the defect, it would not necessarily follow that he was guilty of contributory negligence, because, in the busy and prompt performance of his work, he did not remember the exact locality of the point of danger.
Snow v. Housatonic Co. 8 Allen, 441; Greenleaf v. Ill. Cent. R. R. Co. 29 Iowa, 14.

Mr. E. W. Meddaugh, for defendant in error:

It was not negligence in the defendant Company, in respect of its employees having to use the railroad track in question, to lay the track on any curve practicable for the operation of cars upon it. There is no possible rule of safety in the radius of a track's curve. It is always only a question of degrees and danger. Nor is there any common rule of practice. To refer the matter to a jury in every case—that most incompetent of bodies for such a question—would be in effect to make railway companies insurers of the safety of such tracks; for there would be no escape from liability.

In Day v. Toledo, etc. R. R. Co. 43 Mich. 528, there was an exceptional danger in the work of coupling. The man was experienced in the business. The danger was apparent and not hidden. In all essential particulars it was like the case at bar. The same principle is applicable.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action for negligence resulting in the death of plaintiff's husband and intestate, Orson Tuttle, a brakeman in the defendant's employment. The declaration contained three counts, the first of which charged that on or about the 30th of October, 1883, the said Tuttle was in the employ of the defendant in the City of Detroit at the "Detroit, Grand Haven and Milwaukee yards," and in the course of his ordinary employment was ordered to couple some cars standing on a certain track known as "bootjack siding;" that said siding is a double curve track containing a very sharp curve; that in compliance with the order he proceeded to couple certain cars on said siding, which were near a certain boat slip, and while he was endeavoring to couple said cars the "draw heads" of the cars failed to meet and passed each other, allowing the said cars to come so close together that he was crushed to death; that there were no bumpers nor other device on either of the said cars to prevent them from going together, in case said draw heads failed to meet and passed each other; and that the only device on said cars for the purpose of keeping them apart and to receive the concussion in coupling was the draw heads aforesaid. The charge of negligence was that the defendant, disregarding its duty, neglected, in the construction of its said cars, to provide any means to prevent injuring its said employé in case the draw heads of its cars so constructed should fail to meet or pass each other under circumstances set forth; and that the said defendant, in the construction of said "bootjack siding," so called, negligently and unskillfully constructed the same with so sharp a curve that the draw heads of the said cars failed to meet and passed each other, thereby causing the death of the said Orson Tuttle while in the act of coupling said cars as aforesaid, without fault or negligence on his part.

The third count was substantially the same as the first; the second count, which charged a defective construction of the car, in not supplying it with bumpers, or other means of preventing the draw heads from passing each other, was abandoned at the trial As stated in the brief of the plaintiff's counsel, "the first and third counts allege that the bootjack siding was negligently and unskillfully constructed by the defendant, with so sharp a curve that the draw heads of the cars in use by it would pass each other and cause the cars to crush any one who attempted to make a coupling thereon;" and this alleged faulty construction of the track was the principal matter of contest on the trial; the plaintiff contending that the defendant was bound, in duty to its workmen and employés, to construct a track that would not expose them to the danger which existed in this case; whilst the defendant contended, and offered evidence to prove, that the track was constructed according to the requirements of the situation, a sharp curve being necessary at that place in order to place the cars, when loading, alongside of the dock or slip; that such curves are not uncommon in station yards; that in such conditions the draw heads of cars quite often pass each other when the cars come together; that this must be presumed to have been well known to Tuttle, the deceased, who was an experienced yard man; that he accepted the employment with the full knowledge of its risks, and must be held to have assumed them; and that it was negligence on his part to place himself in such a situation as to incur the danger and suffer the injury complained of. It appeared by the evidence that, when trying to make the coupling, the deceased stood on the inside of the curve where the corners of the cars come in contact when the draw heads pass each other, and will crush a person caught between them; whereas, on the outside of the curve they are widely separated, and there is no danger. The defendants contended that the position thus taken by Tuttle was contributory negligence on his part. On the other hand, the plaintiff offered evidence tending to show that it was usual for the brakeman in coupling cars on a curve to stand on the inside, so as to see the engineer and exchange signals with him for stopping, backing or going forward. The defendants contended, and offered evidence tending to show, that this was not necessary, as there were always the yard master or others standing by and co-operating, by whom the signals could be given.

This statement of the pleadings and of the leading issues raised on the trial is sufficient for properly understanding the question of law presented to the court. Upon the evidence adduced, the judge directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant; holding that Tuttle wantonly assumed the risk of remaining upon the inside of the draw bar, when he should have gone on the other side, and that the defendant ought not to be held in this action.

We have carefully read the evidence presented by the bill of exceptions, and although it appears that the curve was a very sharp one at the place where the accident happened, yet we do not think that public policy requires the courts to lay down any rule of law to restrict a railroad company as to the curves it shall use in its freight depots and yards, where the safety of passengers and the public is not involved; much less that it should be left to the varying and uncertain opinions of juries to determine such an engineering question. For analogous cases as to the right of a manufacturer to choose the kind of machinery he will use in his business, see Richards v. Rough, 53 Mich. 213; Hayden v. Smithville Mfg. Co. 29 Conn. 558. The interest of railroad companies themselves is so strongly in favor of easy curves as a means of facilitating the movement of their cars, that it may well be left to the discretion of their officers, and engineers in what manner to construct them for the proper transaction of their business in yards, etc. It must be a very extraordinary case, indeed, in which their discretion in this matter should be interfered with in determining their obligations to their employés. The brakemen and others employed to work in such situations must decide for themselves whether they will encounter the hazards incidental thereto; and if they decide to do so, they must be content to assume the risks. For the views of this court in a cognate matter, see Randall v. Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. 109 U. S. 478, 483 [27: 1003, 1005], where it was said: "A railroad yard, where trains are made up, necessarily has a great number of tracks and switches close to one another; and anyone who enters the service of a railroad company connected with the moving of trains, assumes the risk of that condition of things." It is for those who enter into such employments to exercise all that care and caution which the perils of the business in each case demand. The perils in the present case, arising from the sharpness of the curve were seen and known. They were not like the defects of unsafe machinery which the employer has neglected to repair, and which his employés have reason to suppose is in proper working condition. Everything was open and visible, and the deceased had only to use his senses and his faculties to avoid the dangers to which he was exposed. One of these dangers was that of the draw bars slipping and passing each other when the cars were brought together. It was his duty to look out for this and avoid it. The danger existed only on the inside of the curve. This must have been known to him. It will be presumed that, as an experienced brakeman, he did know it; for it is one of those things which happen in the course of his employment, under such conditions as existed here.

Without attempting, therefore, to give a summary of the evidence, we have no hesitation in saying that the judge was right in holding that the deceased, by voluntarily assuming the risk of remaining on the inside of the draw bar, brought the injury upon himself; and the judge was right, therefore, in directing a verdict for the defendant. We are led to this conclusion, not only on the ground that the deceased, by his own negligence, contributed to the accident, but on the broader ground, already alluded to, that a person who enters into the service of another in a particular employment assumes the risks incident to such employment. Judge Cooley announces the rule in the following terms: "The rule is now well settled," says he, "that, in general, when a servant, in the execution of his master's business, receives an injury which befalls him from one of the risks incident to the business, he cannot hold the master responsible, but must bear the consequences himself. The reason most generally assigned for this rule is that the servant when he engages in the employment, does so in view of all the incidental hazards, and that he and his employer, when making their negotiations, fixing the terms and agreeing upon the compensation that shall be paid to him, must have contemplated these as having an important bearing upon their stipulations. As the servant then knows that he will be exposed to the incidental risk, 'he must be supposed to have contracted that, as between himself and the master, he would run this risk.'" The author proceeds to show that this is also a rule of public policy, inasmuch as an opposite doctrine would not only subject employers to unreasonable and often ruinous responsibilities, thereby embarrassing all branches of business, but it would be an encouragement to the servant to omit that diligence and caution which he is in duty bound to exercise on behalf of his master, to protect him against the misconduct and negligence of others in the same service; and in exercising such diligence and caution he would have a better security against injury to himself than any recourse to the master for damages could afford.

This accurate summary of the law supersedes the necessity of quoting cases, which are referred to by the author and by every recent writer on the same subject. Its application to this case is quite clear. The defendant, as we have seen, had a right to construct its side track with such curves as its engineers deemed expedient and proper; and as to the draw heads, and the absence of bumpers, the plaintiff herself abandoned all claim founded upon any supposed misconstruction of the cars in relation thereto. Then, it was clearly shown to be a not uncommon accident, especially on sharp curves, for the draw heads of cars to slip by and pass each other. Tuttle, the deceased, entered into the employment of the defendant as a brakeman in the yard in question, with a full knowledge (actual or presumed) of all these things—the form of the side tracks, the construction of the cars, and the hazards incident to the service. Of one of these hazards he was unfortunately the victim. The only conclusion to be reached from these undoubted facts is that he assumed the risks of the business, and his representative has no recourse for damages against the Company.

This view of the subject renders it unnecessary to examine the various particular instructions which the plaintiff's counsel requested the court to give to the jury. The only one that need be noticed is the following, namely:

"If the jury find that Tuttle had no notice or knowledge of the fact that the draw heads would pass on a portion of this siding, and that the fact itself would not be noticed or discovered by a careful and prudent man while engaged in coupling cars on said siding, then it cannot be said that he was guilty of contributory negligence, unless it had already come to his knowledge that the draw heads would pass."

On this point the judge stated, in his charge, that "he (the deceased) knew, as he was an experienced man, that draw bars do slip sometimes, even upon a straight track, as it has been testified to, and the sharper the curve the greater was the danger of their slipping." In making this statement the judge was fully borne out by the testimony, and there was no evidence to contradict it.

We find no error in the judgment, and it is therefore affirmed.

Mr. Justice Miller:

I dissent from this judgment, and especially the proposition that the Railroad Company owed no duty to its employés in regard to the sharpness of the curves of the track in the yards in which they are employed.

Mr. Justice Harlan unites in this dissent.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 24-27.)

Practice—bill of exceptions—requirements—Rule 4—affirmance for failure to reduce expenses to proper form.

1. This court can only determine the validity of exceptions duly framed and presented.
2. A bill of exceptions which, instead of stating distinctly those matters of law in the charge which are excepted to, and those only, does not contain any part of the charge, or any exception to it, and undertakes to supply the want by referring to exhibits annexed, containing all the evidence introduced at the trial, the whole charge to the jury, and notes of a desultory conversation which followed between the judge and the counsel on both sides, leaving it to this court to pick out from those notes, if possible, a sufficient statement of some ruling in matter of law, is insufficient.
3. In the case presented, this court affirms the judgment of the court below, without passing on the merits, the plaintiffs in error having failed to reduce their exceptions to proper form.

Argued Apr. 28, 29, 1887. Decided May 23, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Michigan. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. E. J. Estep, for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Daniel H. Ball, Walter H. Smith, A. T. Britton and A. B Browne, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by Maas and others, citizens of Marquette in the State of Michigan, against Hanna and others, commission merchants and citizens of Cleveland in the State of Ohio, upon this contract, signed by the defendants and addressed to the plaintiffs' agent:

"Marquette, Mich., August 22, 1874. We will advance $25.25 per ton on 500 to 1000 tons" (increased by supplemental contract to 2000 tons) "Michigan charcoal pig iron, when delivered at Cleveland."

At the trial the plaintiffs introduced evidence tending to prove that such iron, on which the plaintiffs had advanced $20 a ton, was delivered by them to the defendants on the faith of this contract, and was afterwards sold by the [25] defendants for less than the amount of the plaintiffs' advances; and the plaintiffs recovered a verdict for the difference, amounting to $9,120.52. A motion by the defendants for a new trial was overruled, and judgment entered on the verdict, and the defendants sued out this writ of error.

The bill of exceptions signed by the presiding judge begins by stating that the parties respectively introduced the evidence shown in an exhibit annexed and marked A. That exhibit appears to contain a report of all the evidence introduced at the trial, with minutes that certain parts of it were objected to. The bill of exceptions then, without even stating that exceptions were taken to the admission of any of the evidence, proceeds and concludes as follows:

"And neither party having offered or given further testimony, the cause was argued by counsel; and thereupon the court charged the jury as set forth in the annexed exhibit, marked 'Charge,' and refused to charge as therein set forth; to which charges and refusals to charge the defendant at the time excepted, as set forth in said exhibit; and thereupon, after verdict and within the time fixed by the court, the defendant filed his motion for a new trial, which was heard and overruled by the court; to which ruling the defendant at the time excepted, and the court entered judgment upon the said verdict. Thereupon the defendant requested the court to sign and seal this his bill of exceptions, which is here accordingly done within the time limited by the court."

The exhibit marked "Charge," in the transcript sent up to this court, consists of three closely printed pages setting forth the whole charge of the judge, followed by as many more pages containing what appear to be a stenographer's notes of a conversation ensuing between the judge and the counsel of both parties as to the meaning and effect of the charge already given to the jury, but interspersed with remarks of either counsel that he "excepted," or "desired to note" or "to preserve" an exception to that part of the charge which bore upon a certain subject, or to the refusal of the court to charge as orally requested by counsel in the course of that conversation.

The object of a bill of exceptions is to put on [26] record rulings and instructions in matter of law which could not otherwise be a subject of revision in a court of error. The excepting party, in order to entitle himself to such revision, must not only allege exceptions at the trial or hearing, but he must afterwards draw up and hand to the presiding judge those exceptions in writing, stating distinctly and specifically the rulings or instructions of which he complains. 2 Inst. 426; Steph. Pl. 1st Am. ed. 111; Turner v. Yates, 57 U. S. 16 How. 14, 29 [14:824, 831]; Insurance Co. v. Sea, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 158 [22:511]. If the exceptions so drawn up by the party in writing are found to be true, they are sealed, or often, in the practice of the federal courts, merely signed by the presiding judge. Herbert v. Butler, 97 U. S. 319 [24:958]; Rev. Stat. § 953. Minutes of the judge or clerk, or notes of a stenographer, cannot take the place of a bill of exceptions, but are only memoranda by the aid of which one may afterwards be drawn up. Pomeroy v. Bank of Indiana, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 592 [17:688]; Thompson v. Riggs, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 663 [18:704]; Young v. Martin, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 354 [19:418]; Insurance Co. v. Lanier, 95 U. S. 171 [24:383]. The exceptions must be drawn up and settled in proper form in the court below, and cannot be amended or redrafted in this court. Stimpson v. Westchester R. Co. 44 U. S. 3 How. 552 [11:722].

This bill of exceptions has been framed and allowed in disregard of the settled rules of law upon the subject. No ruling upon evidence is open to revision, because none appears to have been excepted to; Scott v. Lloyd, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 418, 442 [9:178, 186]; and the overruling of the motion for a new trial is not a subject of exception. R. Co. v. Heck, 102 U. S. 120 [26:58]. The bill of exceptions, instead of stating distinctly, as required by law and by the 4th Rule of this court, those matters of law in the charge which are excepted to, and those only, does not contain any part of the charge, or any exception to it, and undertakes to supply the want by referring to exhibits annexed, containing all the evidence introduced at the trial, the whole charge to the jury, and notes of a desultory conversation which followed between the judge and the counsel on both sides, leaving it to this court to pick out from those notes, if possible, a sufficient statement of some ruling in matter of law.

But to assume to do that would be to take upon ourselves the duty of drawing up a proper bill of exceptions, a duty which belonged to the excepting party, and should have been performed before suing out the writ of error. This we are not authorized to do. Our duty and authority are limited to determining the validity of exceptions duly framed and presented.

The defendants having failed to reduce their exceptions to such a form that this court can pass upon them, the judgment must be affirmed. Suydam v. Williamson, 61 U. S. 20 How. 427 [15:978]; Insurance Co. v. Sea, above cited.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLIAM H. ROBERTSON, Collector of the PORT OF NEW YORK.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 116-121.)

Duties—Treaties with Denmark and Hawaiian Islands—sugar imported from dominions of Denmark, not free from duty.

1. The Treaty between the United States and Denmark does not require the former to extend to the latter without compensation, privileges which it has conceded to the Hawaiian Islands in exchange for valuable concessions.

2. Sugar imported from the dominions of Denmark is not entitled to exemption from duty under the treaty with that country, because of the exemption from duty of sugar imported from the Hawaiian Islands; such exemption being in consideration of reciprocal commissions.

Argued April 29, 1887. Decided May 23, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Reported below, 21 Blatchf. 211. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Henry E. Tremain and A. J. Willard, for plaintiffs in error:

In the case at bar this court is called upon to interpret and to apply the Treaty, and to determine, in disposing of the resistance of the Executive Department to its application, whether that resistance is by proper authority, and whether either Congress or any governmental authority has in any wise intruded upon the operation of the treaty article in question and upon the co-ordinate obligation on the part of the Judiciary Department of the United States Government to enforce this Treaty as part of the municipal law of the land.

A peculiarity of the judicial powers of the courts of this country in regard to treaties is thus alluded to by Chief Justice Marshall in the Supreme Court of the United States; "A treaty is in its nature a contract between two Nations, not a legislative Act. It does not generally effect, of itself, the object to be accomplished, especially so far as its operation is infraterritorial; but is carried into execution by the sovereign power of the respective parties to the instrument. In the United States a different principle is established. Our Constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is consequently to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an Act of the Legislature, whenever it operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision. * * * Foster v. Neilson, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 253–314 (7: 415, 435). * * * The courts are bound to take judicial notice of and to enforce in any appropriate proceeding the rights of persons growing out of that treaty."

U. S. v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 408 (ante, 425).

This court will take the treaty provision as municipal law and apply it to the case in hand unless insurmountable obstacles intervene. In the entire absence of any congressional action since the treaty provision became operative, no obstacle, and no reason for one, is presented.

The following are some of the notable instances where this court has expounded treaties or determined rights claimed under treaty provisions:

U. S. v. The Peggy, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 103 (2: 49); Society Prop. Gospel v. New Haven, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 464 (5: 662); Orr v. Hodgson, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 462 (4: 615); Fairfax v. Hunter's Lessee, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 627 (3: 461); Blight's Lessee v. Rochester, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 544 (5: 518); Chirac v. Chirac, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 271 (4: 237); Prevost v. Greneaux, 60 U. S. 19 How. 7 (15: 574); Foster v. Neilson, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 314 (7: 435); Garcia v. Lee, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 518 (9: 1179); Comegys v. Vasse, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 193 (7: 108); The Amiable Isabella, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 71 (5: 208); Oldfield v. Marriott, 51 U. S. 10 How. 146 (13: 364).

Read as a statute in 1882, existing at all events since September 9, 1876, the Danish Treaty operates, of itself, proprio vigore, to limit the rate and amount of duties on Danish products to such rate and amount of duties as may be at any time payable on the like products of any other foreign country.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs are merchants doing business in the City of New York, and in March and April, 1882, they made four importations of brown and unrefined sugars and molasses, the produce and manufacture of the Island of St. Croix, which is a part of the dominions of [117] the King of Denmark. The goods were regularly entered at the custom house at the Port of New York, the plaintiffs claiming at the time that they should be admitted free of duty under the Treaty with Denmark, because like articles, the produce and manufacture of the Hawaiian Islands, were, under the Treaty with their King, and the Act of Congress of August 15, 1876, to carry that Treaty into operation, admitted free of duty. The defendant, however, who was the Collector of the Port of New York, treated the goods as dutiable articles, and, against the claim of the plaintiffs, exacted duties upon them under the Acts of Congress, without regard to those Treaties, amounting to $33,222, which they paid to the Collector under protest, in order to obtain possession of their goods. They then brought the present action against the Collector to recover the amount thus paid. The action was commenced in a court of the State of New York, and, on motion of the defendant, was transferred to the Circuit Court of the United States.

The complaint sets forth the different importations; that the articles were the produce and manufacture of St. Croix, part of the dominions of the King of Denmark; their entry at the custom house, and the claim of the plaintiffs that they were free from duty by force of the Treaty with the King of Denmark and of that with the King of the Hawaiian Islands; the refusal of the Collector to treat them as free under those Treaties, his exaction of duties thereon to the amount stated, and its payment under protest; and asked judgment for the amount. The defendant demurred to the complaint, on the ground, among others, that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against him. The circuit court sustained the demurrer, and ordered judgment for the defendant with costs (21 Blatchf. 211); and the plaintiffs have brought the case to this court for review.

We are thus called upon to give an interpretation to the clause in the Treaty with Denmark which bears upon the subject of duties on the importation of articles produced or manufactured in its dominions, and the effect upon it of the Treaty of the Hawaiian Islands for the admission without duty of similar articles, the produce and manufacture of that Kingdom.

The existing commercial Treaty between the United States and the King of Denmark, [118] styled "General Convention of Friendship, Commerce, and Navigation," was concluded on the 26th of April, 1826. It was afterwards abrogated, but subsequently renewed, with the exception of one article, on the 13th of January, 1858.

The first article declares that "The contracting parties, desiring to live in peace and harmony with all the other Nations of the earth, by means of a policy frank and equally friendly with all, engage mutually not to grant any particular favor to other Nations in respect to commerce and navigation which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same freely if the concession were freely made, or upon allowing the same compensation if the concession were conditional."

The fourth article declares that "No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any article, the produce or manufacture of the dominions of His Majesty the King of Denmark; and no higher or other duties shall be imposed upon the importation into the said dominions of any article the produce or manufacture of the United States, than are or shall be payable on the like articles being the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country."

The Treaty, or Convention as it is termed, between the King of the Hawaiian Islands and the United States, was concluded January 30, 1875, and was ratified May 31 following. Its first article declares, that "For and in consideration of the rights and privileges granted by His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands," and "as an equivalent therefor," the United States agree to admit all the articles named in a specified schedule, the same being the growth, produce, and manufacture of the Hawaiian Islands, into all the ports of the United States free of duty. Then follows the schedule, which, among other articles, includes brown and all other unrefined sugars and molasses.

The second article declares that "For and in consideration of the rights and privileges granted by the United States of America in the preceding article," and "as an equivalent therefor," the King of the Hawaiian Islands agrees to admit all the articles named in a specified schedule which were the growth, manufacture, or produce of the United States of America, into all the ports of the Hawaiian Islands free of duty. Then follows the schedule mentioned. [119]

By the fourth article it is also agreed on the part of the Hawaiian King, that so long as the Treaty remains in force he will not lease or otherwise dispose of, or create any lien upon any port, harbor, or other territory in his dominions, or grant any special privileges, or rights of use therein, to any other power, State or government, nor make any treaty by which any other Nation shall obtain the same privileges, relative to the admission of any articles free of duty, thereby secured to the United States.

The fifth article declared that the Convention should not take effect until a law had been passed by Congress to carry it into operation. Such a law was passed on the 15th of August, 1876. 19 Stat. at L. 200, chap. 290. It provided that whenever the President of the United States should receive satisfactory evidence that the Legislature of the Hawaiian Islands had passed laws on their part to give full effect to the Convention between the United States and the King of those Islands, signed on the 30th of January, 1875, he was authorized to issue his Proclamation declaring that he had such evidence, and thereupon, from the date of such Proclamation, certain articles, which were named, being the growth, manufacture, or produce of the Hawaiian Islands, should be introduced into the United States free of duty, so long as the Convention remained in force. Such evidence was received by the President, and the Proclamation was made on the 9th of September, 1876.

The duties for which this action was brought were exacted under the Act of the 14th of July, 1870, as amended on the 22d of December of that year. 16 Stat. at L. 262, 397. The Act is of general application, making no exceptions in favor of Denmark or of any other Nation. It provides that the articles specified, without reference to the country from which they come shall pay the duties prescribed. It was enacted several years after the Treaty with Denmark was made. [121]

That the Act of Congress, as amended, authorized and required the duties imposed upon the goods in question, if not controlled by the Treaty with Denmark, after the ratification of the Treaty with the Hawaiian Islands, there can be no question. And it did not lie with the officers of customs to refuse to follow its directions because of the stipulations of the Treaty with Denmark. Those stipulations, even if conceded to be self executing by the way of a proviso or exception to the general law imposing the duties, do not cover concessions like those made to the Hawaiian Islands for a valuable consideration. They were pledges of the two contracting parties, the United States and the King of Denmark, to each other, that, in the imposition of duties upon goods imported into one of the countries which were the produce or manufacture of the other, there should be no discrimination against them in favor of goods of like character imported from any other country. They imposed an obligation upon both countries to avoid hostile legislation in that respect. But they were not intended to interfere with special arrangements with other countries founded upon a concession of special privileges. The stipulations were mutual, for reciprocal advantages. "No higher or other duties" were to be imposed by either upon the goods specified; but if any particular favor should be granted by either to other countries in respect to commerce or navigation, the concession was to become common to the other party upon like consideration; that is, it was to be enjoyed freely if the concession were freely made, or on allowing the same compensation if the concession were conditional.

The Treaty with the Hawaiian Islands makes no provision for the imposition of any duties on goods, the produce or manufacture of that country, imported into the United States. It stipulates for the exemption from duty of certain goods thus imported, in consideration of and as an equivalent for certain reciprocal concessions on the part of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States. There is in such exemption no violation of the stipulations in the Treaty with Denmark, and if the exemption is deemed a "particular favor," in respect of commerce and navigation, within the first article of that Treaty, it can only be claimed by Denmark upon like compensation to the United States. It does not appear that Denmark has ever objected to the imposition of duties upon goods from her dominions imported into [122]

the United States, because of the exemption from duty of similar goods imported from the Hawaiian Islands, such exemption being in consideration of reciprocal concessions, which she has never proposed to make.

Our conclusion is that the Treaty with Denmark does not bind the United States to extend to that country, without compensation, privileges which they have conceded to the Hawaiian Islands in exchange for valuable concessions. On the contrary, the Treaty provides that like compensation shall be given for such special favors. When such compensation is made it will be time to consider whether sugar from her dominions shall be admitted free from duty.

Judgment affirmed.

[21] STATE NATIONAL BANK OF SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS, Plff. in Err.,
v.
ST. LOUIS RAIL FASTENING COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 21-23.)

Practice—certificate of division in opinion—office of — general question — recovery upon checks drawn by clerk of district court.

The office of a certificate of division in opinion between the judges of the circuit court is to submit to this court one or more points of law, and not the whole case, nor the general question whether upon all the facts, as agreed by the parties in a case stated, or specially found by the court when a trial by jury has been waived, the judgment should be for one party or the other.

Submitted April 22, 1887. Decided May 23, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois. Dismissed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was an action of assumpsit, brought by a corporation of Missouri against a National Bank established in Illinois, to recover the amount of certain checks drawn on the Bank in favor of the corporation. Plea, non-assumpsit. A jury was duly waived and the circuit court, held by two judges, found and stated in detail certain facts, which may be summed up as follows:

About March 1, 1878, the Bank was appointed depository for the United States District Court for the Southern District of Illinois, and was informed of the appointment. Shortly afterwards the clerk of that court began to deposit with the Bank funds belonging in the registry of the court, and by his direction the Bank opened an account with the court. These de-22] posits were at first made to the credit of the particular case to which the funds belonged, by name and number; but subsequently by the clerk's direction the name was dropped and only the number was entered on the ticket accompanying each deposit, as well as in the books of the Bank and in the clerk's deposit book, the Bank understanding that the numbers referred to the cases in the court.

During the years 1879, 1880 and 1881 case No. 2105 was pending on the bankruptcy side of the court, and deposits of moneys realized from the estate of H. Sandford & Co., and belonging in that case, amounting to $88,300, were so made and entered.

In May, 1881, four checks, for $2,653.41 in all, drawn by the clerk and countersigned by the judge of the district court, and in the form adopted by the court in its dealings with the Bank, were given by the clerk to the plaintiff for dividends on its claims proved in case No. 2105, and were afterwards presented to the Bank, and refused payment, and on July 8, 1881, were protested for nonpayment.

The funds belonging to case No. 2105 that had been deposited with the Bank would have been more than sufficient to pay these and all other checks drawn in that case; but the account of the court had been overdrawn to the amount of $43.13, by the Bank's having paid checks in the usual form, including many checks drawn in cases, as indicated by the numbers, in which no deposit had ever been made. The Bank always treated the account as an entirety, and paid out of it all the checks drawn against it until the deposits were exhausted.

The Bank never was furnished with a copy of Rule 28 in bankruptcy, and had no actual knowledge of that rule. The clerk never presented to the court the account and vouchers required by the Revised Statutes, section 798, and never made or was required to make the monthly report provided for in that rule.

The two judges certified to this court that upon these facts they were "opposed in opinion as to the legal right of the plaintiff to recover on the checks in controversy." The presiding justice being of opinion that the law of the case was with the plaintiff, judgment was entered accordingly in the circuit court, and the defendant sued out this writ of error.

Mr. Henry S. Greene and Milton Hay, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. George Hunt and C. C. Brown, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of [23]
the court:

The matter in dispute being less than $5,000, the jurisdiction of this court depends upon the certificate of division of opinion, in which the only question certified is whether, upon all the facts found by the court, the plaintiff has the legal right to recover upon the checks in controversy.

But the office of a certificate of a division of opinion between two judges in the circuit court is to submit to this court one or more points of law, and not the whole case, nor the general question whether upon all the facts, as agreed by the parties in a case stated, or specially found by the court when a trial by jury has been waived, the judgment should be for the one party or the other.

In Harris v. Elliott, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 25 [9: 333], one of the questions certified was "upon the facts stated, whether the plaintiffs have any right or title to the lands taken for streets, in which the trespass is supposed to have been committed, and can maintain their said action."

This court held that it could express no opinion upon that question, because, as said by Mr. Justice Thompson in delivering judgment, it "is too general, embracing the merits of the whole case, and does not present any single point or question; and it has been repeatedly ruled in this court that the whole case cannot be brought here, under the Act of 1802, upon such a general question."

The subsequent decisions under the successive Acts of Congress upon this subject are uniformly to the same effect. U. S. v. Briggs, 46 U. S. 5 How. 208 [12: 119]; Nesmith v. Sheldon, 47 U. S. 6 How. 41 [12: 335]; Waterville v. Van Slyke, 116 U. S. 699 [29: 772]; Williamsport Nat. Bank v. Knapp, 119 U. S. 357 [ante, 446].

The necessary conclusion is that the question certified cannot be answered, and that the writ of error must be dismissed.

Railroads—foreclosure proceedings—what is final decree for purposes of appeal.

A decree entered in proceedings to foreclose a railroad mortgage, which ascertains the amount due and orders its payment by a day certain, but which does not fully identify the property, nor determine the extent and amount of prior liens, what the order of sale shall contain, nor what shall be the form of advertisement for the sale, is not final for purposes of an appeal. Until the particulars of the prior liens are ascertained, the property identified and the time, place and manner of sale determined, the litigation between the parties on the merits of the case will not be determined.

R. R. Co. v. Swasey, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 405 (23:136), is an apt illustration of what is not a final decree.

This is a motion to dismiss an appeal, because the decree appealed from is not a final decree, and also because the value of the matter in dispute does not exceed $5,000.

The suit was originally brought by William M. Robinson, the holder of general mortgage bonds, so called, of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, to the amount of $5,000, [113] to foreclose the mortgage given for their security. Afterwards Edwin Parsons, the present appellant and the holder of $100,000 of the same issue of bonds, intervened by leave of the court, and became a party complainant in the suit.

On the 6th of October, 1886, a decree was entered, finding that the railroad company had made default in the payment of the interest, and that the complainants were "entitled to have a sale of the mortgaged premises, in accordance with the provisions in said mortgage contained, upon the failure of the defendant to pay, within a time to be hereafter fixed, the amount of the bonds and coupons now outstanding entitled to the security of the said mortgage;" and for the purpose of finding this amount the cause was referred to masters to ascertain and report "the amount due upon the bonds, principal and interest, which are entitled to the security of said mortgage; and also to report what liens, if any, are prior to the bonds, or to any and what bonds secured by said mortgage; and also to ascertain and report the extent of the lien of the said mortgage upon the railroad, branches, leasehold interests, franchises, and other property of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, including not only the property owned by said company at the time of the execution of said mortgage, but also that which has since been acquired."

Afterwards the masters filed their report, setting forth: 1, the amount due on the bonds entitled to the security of the general mortgage; 2, the liens which were prior to that mortgage; and 3, by general description, the property covered. Exceptions were taken to this report, and, on consideration thereof, the court ordered, March 7, 1887, that the company pay, on or before June 7, 1887, the amount found due by the masters for interest, and also $1,694,250 for "general mortgage scrip," with interest from July 1, 1886, and in default thereof, "that the defendants, the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, Samuel W. Bell, trustee, the Pennsylvania Company for Insurances on Lives and Granting Annuities, trustees, and all persons claiming under them, be absolutely barred and foreclosed of and from all right and equity of redemption in and to the premises in said mortgage described; and, in default of [114] such payment as aforesaid, the court do further order and decree the defendant, the Fidelity Insurance, Trust and Safe Deposit Company, trustee in said mortgage mentioned, to sell the railroads, estates, real and personal, corporate rights and franchises and premises in said mortgage mentioned, at such time and place and in such manner as the court may hereafter determine; and it is further ordered that this cause be referred to the masters heretofore appointed, with instructions to report to the court, on or before the 10th day of July, 1887, the extent and amount of all liens prior to said general mortgage upon the properties thereby covered, and also to report to the court full and detailed statements of the several properties, real and personal, of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company subject to the lien of said general mortgage, in accordance with the principles stated in the report of the masters heretofore filed, and also to report what liens, if any, are upon the several properties of the said Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company and the Philadelphia and Reading Iron and Coal Company junior to said general mortgage, and the order of their priority; and it is further ordered that said masters do prepare and report to the court an order of sale of said mortgaged properties, and form of advertisement therefor."

From that decree this appeal was taken by Parsons alone; and the first question we will consider is whether it is a final decree within the meaning of that term as used in the statutes which provide for appeals to this court from the final decrees of the circuit courts in cases of equity jurisdiction.

That "a decree of sale in a foreclosure suit, which settles all the rights of the parties and leaves nothing to be done but to make the sale and pay out the proceeds, is a final decree for the purposes of an appeal," is no longer an open question in this court. Grant v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 106 U. S. 429, 431 [27:287,288], and cases there cited. Here, however, there is as yet no decree of sale. As was said in R. R. Co. v. Swasey, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 409 [23:137], "To justify such a sale, without consent, the amount due upon the debt must be determined and the property to be sold ascertained and defined. Until [115] this is done, the rights of the parties are not all settled. Final process for the collection of money cannot issue until the amount to be paid or collected by the process, if not paid, has been adjudged. So, too, process for the sale of specific property cannot issue until the property to be sold has been judicially identified."

In this case the amount due upon the debt has been ascertained and its payment by a day certain ordered; but "the extent and amount of all liens prior to said general mortgage upon the property thereby covered" have not been determined, and "full and detailed statements of the several properties * * * subject to the lien of said general mortgage" have not been furnished to the court. Neither has it been determined what "the order of sale of said mortgage properties" shall contain, nor what shall be the "form of the advertisement therefor." The court has, indeed, declared its intention of hereafter directing such a sale; but, as it requires further information to enable it to act understandingly in that behalf, has sent the case again to the masters with instructions to inquire and report upon the matters in doubt. All this is necessarily implied from the provision that the sale is to be "at such time and place and in such manner as the court may hereafter determine," coupled, as it is, with directions to the masters to "prepare and report to the court an order of sale of said mortgaged properties and form of advertisement therefor," together with a statement in detail of the property to be sold and its exact condition as to prior incumbrances. No order of sale can issue on this decree until these questions are settled and the court has given its authority in that behalf. Further judicial action must be had by the court before its ministerial officers can proceed to carry the decree into execution. Until the particulars of the prior liens are ascertained, the property identified, and the time, place, and manner of sale determined, the rights of the parties will not have been sufficiently settled to make it proper, in the opinion of the court, as expressed in its present decree, to direct that the sale go on. All these matters still remain for adjudication, and the decree, as it now stands, has not "terminated the litigation between the parties on the merits of the case." [116]
Consequently it is not final. Bostwick v. Brinkerhoff, 106 U. S. 3 [27:78], and the cases there cited.

As the motion to dismiss must be granted on this ground, it is unnecessary to consider whether the amount in dispute is sufficient to give us jurisdiction.

Dismissed.

Des Moines River Grant—history of—order of Secretary of Interior—Joint Resolution of March 2, 1861—effect of.

1. The Joint Resolution of March 2, 1861, relinquishing the title of the United States to certain lands, situated along the Des Moines River above the Raccoon Fork, and then held by bona fide purchasers under the State of Iowa, did not operate to terminate the order of the Secretary of the Interior, withdrawing said lands from public sale, settlement or preemption.

2. It is therefore held in the case presented, that a claim based upon settlements made on such lands before and after the passage of the Act of July 12, 1862, granting them to the State of Iowa for the original purposes of the grant of 1846, is invalid.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Edward F. Bullard, in person, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. John F. Duncombe, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa.

The case originated in a suit in equity, brought in the District Court of that State for the County of Humboldt by Edward F. Bul-[169] lard, who is the appellant here. The object of the bill was to quiet or remove clouds upon the title of the plaintiff to certain lands in that State, to which the defendant filed an answer and cross bill, asking that its own title might be declared to be good and established by the decree of the court. The district court of that county made a decree in favor of the defendant, which on appeal to the Supreme Court of the State was affirmed.

There were many questions considered in the state courts of which this court can take no jurisdiction. But the main question raised there, and the only one here, has relation to a subject which has been often considered by this court. It arises out of what is called the Des Moines River Land Grant, which was originally made by the Congress of the United States to the then Territory of Iowa. A short history of the matters growing out of that grant, with some references to the decisions of this court, will simplify the complex record presented in this case.

By the Act of Congress of August 8, 1846, 9 Stat. at L., p. 77, there was "granted to the Territory of Iowa, for the purpose of aiding said Territory to improve the navigation of the Des Moines River from its mouth to the Raccoon Fork (so called), in said Territory, one equal moiety, in alternate sections, of the public lands, remaining unsold, and not otherwise disposed of, encumbered, or appropriated, in a strip five miles in width on each side of said river, to be selected within said Territory by an agent or agents to be appointed by the Governor thereof, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States."

Soon after the passage of this statute the State of Iowa created a board of public works, to take charge of this river improvement under a system of slack water navigation on that stream. The contract for the execution of the work came into the hands of a corporation called the Des Moines Navigation Company. The work progressed for a number of years, several dams and locks being built from the mouth of the river upwards, the means for paying the contractors coming solely from the sales of the lands granted to the State for that purpose. These lands, as the work went on [170] and the money was needed, were certified to the State by the Secretary of the Treasury, and by it either sold to purchasers or conveyed to the contractors who did the work. The State made no appropriations and furnished no means from any other source than this for the prosecution of the enterprise.

So long as no request on the part of the State for the certification of lands lying above the mouth of the Raccoon Fork was made of the Secretary of the Treasury, no question arose as to the extent of the grant. Afterwards, however, when a demand was made upon that officer that such lands should be certified, he objected on the ground that the grant of lands did not extend beyond that point; that, as by the language of the statute making the grant it was "for the improvement of the Des Moines River from its mouth to the Raccoon Fork," it was not intended to grant lands lying above that point, although the same river ran through the entire length of the State, from near its northwestern corner, in the Territory of Minnesota to the southeast corner, where it flows into the Mississippi River.

This question became the subject of active negotiations and controversy between the State of Iowa, through its Governor and members of Congress, and the Treasury Department, as well as the Interior Department, which was created during this time and succeeded to the charge of this subject. Meanwhile one of the secretaries certified to the State a part of the land in dispute, running to a certain range of townships above the Raccoon Fork. It may as well be stated here that the lands now in controversy were not among the lands so certified, but are among the odd sections lying north of those thus certified and within five miles of the Des Moines River.

On April 6, 1850, Secretary Ewing, while concurring with Attorney-General Crittenden in his opinion that the grant of 1846 did not extend above the Raccoon Fork, issued an order withholding all the lands then in controversy from market "until the close of the then session of Congress," which order has been continued ever since, in order to give the State the opportunity of petitioning for an extension of the grant by Congress. This court has decided in a number of cases, in regard to these lands, that this withdrawal operated to exclude from [171] sale, purchase, or preemption all the lands in controversy; and unless the case we are about to consider constitutes an exception, it has never been revoked.

In 1856 Congress granted to the State of Iowa, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of several railroads across that State from the Mississippi to the Missouri River, every alternate section, as shown by odd numbers, of the lands on each side of said roads, each of which, when the line was fixed, crossed the Des Moines River and ran through the lands which the State claimed had been granted to it for the purpose of improving the navigation of that stream.

Pending this controversy between the State of Iowa and the authorities of the United States as to the extent of the grant, a suit was brought by one of these railroad companies, that the question might be decided by this court. The case is reported as the Dubuque & Pacific R. R. Co. v. Litchfield, 64 U. S. 23 How. 66 [16: 500] decided in 1860, and it was held that the grant did not extend above the Raccoon Fork. As soon as this decision was made, the State, through its congressional delegation, sought the action of the Congress of the United States to obtain the passage of an Act which would secure the grant to the State and its grantees in the full extent which they believed Congress had originally intended by the Act of 1846. That the propriety of some action by Congress, and the demand for it was pressing, is obvious when we consider that the Des Moines Navigation Company, under contract with the State, had spent large sums of money beyond what they had received from the State, and beyond the value of the lands certified to the State by the secretary. The work, with all the materials and implements on hand, was suspended, and the danger of the works being swept away and ruined by floods in the river was imminent. The whole subject was before Congress; but, without waiting to dispose of it entirely, that body, by way of immediate relief, passed the following Joint Resolution, approved March 2, 1861, 12 Stat. at L. 251.

"That all the title which the United States still retain in the tracts of land along the Des [172] Moines River, and above the mouth of the Raccoon Fork thereof, in the State of Iowa, which have been certified to said State improperly by the Department of the Interior, as part of the grant by Act of Congress approved August 8, 1846, and which is now held by bona fide purchasers under the State of Iowa, be and the same is hereby relinquished to the State of Iowa."

At the next session of Congress a Statute was passed, approved July 12, 1862, which provided as follows:

"That the grant of lands to the then Territory of Iowa for the improvement of the Des Moines River made by the Act of August 8, 1846, is hereby extended so as to include the alternate sections (designated by odd numbers) lying within five miles of said river, between the Raccoon Fork and the northern boundary of said State; such lands are to be held and applied in accordance with the provisions of the original grant, except that the consent of Congress is hereby given to the application of a portion thereof to aid in the construction of the Keokuk, Fort Des Moines and Minnesota Railroad, in accordance with the provisions of the Act of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, approved March 22, 1858, etc." 12 Stat. at L. 543.

By this Joint Resolution and this Act of Congress the United States relieved so far as it could the misfortune of the construction of the grant to the Territory of Iowa of 1846, made by this court, and ratified the construction which had always been claimed by the State.

During all this controversy there remained the order of the department having control of the matter, withdrawing all the lands in dispute from public sale, settlement or preemption. This withdrawal was held to be effectual against the grant made by Congress to the railroad companies in 1856, because that Act contained the following proviso:

"That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States, by any Act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement, or for any other purpose whatsoever, be, and the same are hereby, reserved to the United States from the operation [173] of this Act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the routes of said railroads through such reserved lands, in which case the right of way only shall be granted, subject to the approval of the President of the United States." 11 Stat. at L. 9.

See Wolcott v. Des Moines Co. 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 681 [18:689], and Williams v. Baker, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 144 [21:561], in which cases is also to be found a very full and clear recital of the history of this Des Moines grant controversy.

On May, 1860, the Commissioner of the General Land-Office sent to the registers and receivers of that office at Des Moines and Fort Dodge the following printed notice:

"Notice is hereby given that the land along the Des Moines River, in Iowa, within the claimed limits of the Des Moines grant, in that State, above the mouth of the Raccoon Fork of said river, which has been reserved from sale heretofore on account of the claim of the State thereto, will continue reserved, for the time being, from sale or from location, by any species of scrip or warrants, notwithstanding the recent decision of the supreme court against the claim. This action is deemed necessary to afford time for Congress to consider, upon memorial or otherwise, the case of actual bona fide settlers holding under titles from the State, and to make such provision, by confirmation or adjustment of the claims of such settlers, as may appear to be right and proper.

"JOHN S. WILSON,
"Commissioner of the Gen. Land-Office
"Gen. Land-Office, May 18, 1860."

It will thus be seen that, notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the winter of 1860, the land-office determined that the reservation of these lands should continue for the purpose of securing the very action by Congress which the State of Iowa was soliciting, and it is not disputed by counsel for the appellant in this case that this was a valid continuation of such reservation and that during its continuance the preemptions under which the plaintiff claims could not have been made. But it is argued that the Joint [174] Resolution of 1861 terminated this condition of suspense, and in and of itself ended the withdrawal of these lands which had been established and continued since the controversy originated between the State and the Federal Government as to the extent of the grant. This is the only foundation on which plaintiff's title to the land in controversy in this case rests.

We do not think the Joint Resolution had the effect to end the reservation of these lands from public entry. Whether we consider the purpose of the original order, its long continuance, and that it has been held, in the face of an Act of Congress granting lands for public purposes to the railroads already mentioned, to constitute such a withdrawal as that Act excepts from the operations of the grant, and that up to the present time no preemptions or sales have been finally recognized as valid by the department or by the courts, it would be very extraordinary if the Joint Resolution should have that effect. It does not purport to act upon all the matters which were in controversy between the State and the General Government. It certainly did not act upon all the claims and matters in question then pending before Congress in regard to these lands. It was, indeed, a very limited disposition of a part of the matter, which Congress supposed might then be acted upon with safety without further investigation. It was simply the recognition of the title which had passed to the grantees of the State of Iowa in regard to the lands which had been certified by the proper authorities of the General Government to the State under the Act of 1846, and which, by the decision in Dubuque and Pacific R. R. Co. v. Litchfield [supra], had been held to be unwarranted by the statute. Congress, urgently pressed by parties who were innocent purchasers under the State, passed the resolution which went to this extent, in the last days of the session, securing to such purchasers, so far as the United States could do so, their title to the lands that they had bought under the sanction of this action of the department.

The broader and larger question of the title to the lands within five miles of the Des Moines [175] River, above Raccoon Fork, which had not been certified to the State, and which were declared by the decision of Dubuque & Pacific R. R. Co. v. Litchfield not to be included within the grant of 1846, Congress retained for further consideration, and, at its next session after this Joint Resolution was passed, it completely disposed of the whole subject, so far as it was within its power to do so, by validating the grant of 1846 to the full extent of the construction claimed by the State of Iowa. If the order of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office of May 18, 1860, was in force up to the passage of the Joint Resolution, it is not possible to perceive why it terminated then. It was declared by the commissioner that the order or notice was made to protect these lands from location by any species of scrip or warrant, notwithstanding the decision of the supreme court to afford time for Congress to further consider the case.

This is not the way in which a reservation from sale or preemption of public lands is removed. In almost every instance, in which such a reservation is terminated, there has been a proclamation by the President that the lands are open for entry or sale, and in most instances they have first been offered for sale at public auction. It cannot be seen, from anything in the Joint Resolution, that Congress either considered the controversy ended or intended to remove the reservation instituted by the department. Its immediate procedure at the next session to the full consideration of the whole subject shows that it had not ceased to deal with it; that the reason for this withdrawal or reservation continued as strongly as before, and it cannot be doubted that the subject was before Congress, as well as before its committees, and that the Act of July 12, 1862, was, for the first time, a conclusion and end of the matter so far as Congress was concerned.

The title of the plaintiff, therefore, rests upon settlements upon odd sections of land within five miles of the Des Moines River, which were reserved from sale or preemption at the time the settlements were made. Two of the settlements, which are the foundation of plaintiff's title, were made in May, 1862, only a few days before the passage of the Act of July in the same year; and one of the settlements under [176] which the plaintiff claims was made after the passage of that Act. The title was transferred by that Act to the State of Iowa for the original purposes of the grant of 1846.

The object of this bill is to have a declaration of the court that the title of the plaintiff under those settlements and preemptions is superior to the title conferred by Congress on the State of Iowa and her grantees under the Act of July 12, 1862. If the lands were at the time of these settlements and preemption declarations effectually withdrawn from settlement, sale or preemption, by the orders of the department, which we have considered, there is an end of the plaintiff's title, for by that withdrawal or reservation the lands were reserved for another purpose, to which they were ultimately appropriated by the Act of 1862, and no title could be initiated or established, because the Land Department had no right to grant it. This proposition, which we have fully discussed, will be found supported by the following decisions, which are decisive of the whole controversy. Dubuque & Pac. R. R. Co. v. Litchfield, 64 U. S. 23 How. 66 [16:500]; Wolcott v. Des Moines Co. 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 681 [18:689]; Homestead Co. v. Valley R. R. 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 153 [21:622]; Williams v. Baker and Cedar Rapids R. R. Co. v. Des Moines Nav. Co. Id. 144 [21:561]; Wolsey v. Chapman, 101 U. S. 755 [25:915]; Dubuque etc. R. R. Co. v. Des Moines V. R. R. Co. 109 U. S. 334 [27:954].

The judgment of the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa, founded on the same view of the subject as above set forth, is therefore affirmed.

Husband and wife—transactions between—right of husband to settle property upon wife—conveyance by husband when insolvent to secure indebtedness to wife—consideration.

1. The right of a husband to settle a portion of his property upon his wife, if he does not thereby impair the claims of existing creditors, and the settlement is not intended as a cover to future schemes of fraud, is indisputable.

2. While transactions by way of purchase or security between husband and wife should be carefully scrutinized, when they are shown to have been upon full consideration from one to the other, or, when voluntary, that the husband was at the time free from debt and possessed of ample means, the same protection should be afforded to them as to like transactions between third parties.

3. An indebtedness from the husband to the wife, arising upon the application of the proceeds of real estate, purchased for the wife by the husband when solvent, to the payment of the husband's debts, is a sufficient consideration to support a conveyance by him, when insolvent, to secure such indebtedness.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western Division of the Western District of Missouri. Opinion below, 12 Fed. Rep. 739. 4 McCrary, 179. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. James S. Botsford and M. T. C. Williams, for appellants.

Mr. George G. Vest, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity to set aside as fraudu- [497] lent and void, as against the plaintiffs and other creditors of the defendant William Miller, a deed of 920 acres of land in Atchison County, Missouri, executed by him and Mary Miller, his wife, to William L. Patterson, as trustee, to secure to her an alleged debt of $16,000. The deed bears date on the 10th of November, 1873, and recites the indebtedness to her of William Miller in the amount stated with interest from June 25, 1871, "being the sum realized and received by said William Miller from the sale of the individual property of the said Mary Miller, and used by him in payment for the real estate hereinbefore mentioned and described, and to secure the indebtedness [498] of the said William Miller on account thereof, which said sum of $16,000, with interest thereon, is due and payable on the 25th day of June, A. D. 1876."

It appears that William Miller was, in 1857, and for some years afterwards, a merchant in Catasauqua [Lehigh] County, Pennsylvania, and was successful in business there. Subsequently he became a contractor for the raising of mineral ores in that State, and at a later period was engaged in building the Lehigh and Susquehanna Railroad. In 1868 he was a contractor on the Union Pacific Railroad. In this business he made large sums of money. In 1873 he had a contract for building the whole or part of the Chicago and Atlantic Railway in Ohio, and, on the 20th of August of that year, he sublet to the plaintiffs the construction of twelve miles of the road. By the terms of his contract with them he was to pay for the work of each month during the following month, after the receipt of the estimate of the work by the engineer in charge. The work as thus estimated for the months of September and October of that year, amounted to $7,153, and the subsequent work in that and the following year carried this amount to about $14,000. For the indebtedness thus incurred the plaintiffs brought suit in the Circuit Court of Atchison County and sued out a writ of attachment, which was levied upon the land embraced in the trust deed to William L. Patterson. Judgment was recovered in that suit for $14,000, but to the enforcement of the attachment the trust deed to Patterson was in the way, and, in order that the attachment might be enforced by a sale of the land, the present suit was commenced to set the deed aside.

The truth of the recital, that the indebtedness, to secure which the deed was executed, was for sums realized and received by William Miller from the sale of the individual property of Mary Miller, is assailed, and the statement averred to be false, and the instrument charged to have been executed to defraud the plaintiffs and other creditors of Miller.

In support of the truth of the recital, several deeds of valuable property to Mrs. Miller, executed and delivered in 1865, 1866 and 1868 were [499] produced, and the property shown to have been afterwards used to pay the debts of William Miller. Thus, on the 9th of November, 1865, she received a deed from one Thomas and wife of a certain tract of ground in Catasauqua, Pennsylvania, reciting a consideration of $8,050. On February 26, 1866, she received a deed from Horn and wife of another tract of land in the same place, for the alleged consideration of $1,200. On April 1, 1868, she acquired a further piece of property in that place by deed from one Koons and wife, reciting a consideration of $6,000. These three deeds were for "her only proper use and behoof."

It is conceded that William Miller, the husband, furnished the money with which these several tracts were purchased. That fact does not affect the validity of the deeds, nor the right of the wife to hold the property for her own use. He was at the time possessed of ample means, beyond any claim against him. Indeed, it does not appear that he was then in debt at all, and, as we said in Jones v. Clifton, 101 U. S. 225 [25: 908], "The right of a husband to settle a portion of his property upon his wife, and thus provide against the vicissitudes of fortune, when this can be done without impairing existing claims of creditors, is indisputable. Its exercise is upheld by the courts as tending not only to the future comfort and support of the wife, but also, through her, to the support and education of any children of the marriage. It arises, as said by Chief Justice Marshall, in Sexton v. Wheaton, as a consequence of that absolute power which a man possesses over his own property, by which he can make any disposition of it which does not interfere with the existing rights of others." 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 229 [5: 603]. And in Moore v. Page, 111 U. S. 117 [28: 373], we said: "It is no longer a disputed question that a husband may settle a portion of his property upon his wife if he does not thereby impair the claims of existing creditors, and the settlement is not intended as a cover to future schemes of fraud. The settlement may be made either by the purchase of property and taking a deed thereof in her name, or by its transfer to trustees for her benefit."

On the 14th of February, 1870, Mrs. Miller also received a deed of a tract of land in Atchison County, Missouri, from Ramsay and wife, [500] containing, as represented, about 520 acres, and called the Ramsay farm. The consideration of this deed is stated to have been $11,000.

In this case it appears that a portion of the claim of the plaintiffs, amounting to $7,153, was due when the deed of trust was executed, and also that William Miller was at that time insolvent. If, therefore, there had been no other consideration for the deed than a desire to secure for his wife provision against the necessities of the future, it could not be sustained. It must find its support in the fact alleged in the recital, that the amount secured was a sum realized from the sale of her individual property, and used by him. It is not material whether the recital be accurate in stating that the sum received from the sale of her property was used in payment of the real estate covered by the deed; it is sufficient if Miller was indebted to his wife in the amount mentioned. That the property in Pennsylvania, deeds of which are mentioned above, was used for his benefit, and to pay or secure his debts, is sufficiently established. The amount realized therefrom, as we read the evidence, was greater than the sum named in the trust deed as due to her. That deed for her security stands, therefore, upon full consideration. Had it been given to a third party for a like debt it would not be open to question that it would have been unassailable. The result is not changed because the wife is the person to whom the debt is due and not another. While transactions by way of purchase or security between husband and wife should be carefully scrutinized, when they are shown to have been upon full consideration from one to the other, or when voluntary, that the husband was at the time free from debt and possessed of ample means, the same protection should be afforded to them as to like transactions between third parties.

In reaching this conclusion we do not treat the Ramsay farm in Missouri as having become the separate property of Mrs. Miller by the conveyance being taken in her individual name; and therefore have no occasion to consider whether, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of that State, it could be protected from the creditors of her husband.

This conclusion, with reference to the deed of trust, renders it unnecessary to consider the [501] numerous transactions of William Miller in the purchase and sale of property, and in his dealings with his creditors. They are not always as susceptible of explanation as would be desirable. It is enough, however, that they do not weigh down the considerations we have mentioned.

The decree is affirmed.

[1] WILLIAM BARNES, Trustee, Appt.,
v.
CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE AND ST. PAUL RAILWAY COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 1-21.)

Railroads—bill to foreclose mortgage of the La Crosse and Milwaukee Railroad Company—former foreclosure—bondholders, bound by—estoppel—decree upon creditors' bill—limitation of.

1. Upon a bill to foreclose the mortgage executed by the La Crosse and Milwaukee Railroad Company, June 21, 1858, it is held:

a. That the holders of the bonds secured by said mortgage consented in law to the foreclosure of February 11, 1859, made by the Trustee under the Wisconsin Act of February 8, 1859, and are bound thereby;

b. That the Milwaukee and Minnesota Railroad Company, organized to take the title of the property for the benefit of the bondholders, upon said foreclosure, represented the mortgage and the holders of the bonds secured thereby in the suits to enforce prior liens to which it was a party;

c. That the Trustee and the bondholders are bound by the decrees in said suits;

d. That the silence of the holders of the bonds, represented by the complainants, and which were not surrendered upon the organization of the Minnesota Company, during all the time said company was acting in their behalf, is equivalent to actual consent to the sale under which the company acquired the right to represent their interests in the litigation with prior lienholders;

e. That the decree in a certain suit by judgment creditors of the La Crosse Company to set aside the mortgage in question and the foreclosure thereunder, although broader in its terms, must be held to mean only that the foreclosure was voidable as to such creditors;

f. That said decree did not dissolve the Minnesota Company; and that said company still owned the property, subject only to the inferior liens of the creditors whose rights had been established.

2. Every decree in a suit in equity must be considered in connection with the pleadings; and if its language is broader than is required, it will be limited by construction so that its effect shall be such, and such only, as is needed for the purposes of the case that has been made and the issues that have been decided.

Argued March 22, 23, 24, 1887. Decided May 23, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Francis Fellowes, and William Barnes, for appellant.

Mr. John W. Cary, for appellee.

This is a suit by William Barnes to foreclose a mortgage made to him, as Trustee, by the La Crosse and Milwaukee Railroad Company, hereinafter designated as the La Crosse Company. The record shows that this company was incorporated by the Legislature of Wisconsin on the 11th of April, 1852, to build and operate a railroad in that State between La Crosse, on the Mississippi River, and Milwaukee, on Lake Michigan, a distance of about 200 miles. The road was originally regarded by the company and treated as consisting of two divisions —one, called the Eastern Division, extending from Milwaukee to Portage City, a distance of 95 miles; and the other, called the Western Division, extending from La Crosse to Portage City, a distance of 105 miles.

The Eastern Division was incumbered by three mortgages, as follows: 1, the Palmer mortgage, so called, to secure an issue of bonds to the amount of $922,000; 2, a mortgage to Greene C. Bronson and James T. Soutter, to secure bonds to the amount of $1,000,000; and 3, a mortgage to the City of Milwaukee, to secure about $314,000. The Western Division was likewise incumbered: 1, by a mortgage to Greene C. Bronson, James T. Soutter and Shepherd F. Knapp, known as the land grant mortgage, to secure bonds to the amount of $4,000,000; and 2, by a mortgage to Albert Helfenstein, to secure bonds for $200,000.

Judgments had also been rendered against [3] the company prior to June 21, 1858, as follows:

1. One in favor of Selah Chamberlain, in the Circuit Court of the United States of the District of Wisconsin, on the second of October, 1857, for $629,089.72; (2) another in the same court, on the 7th of October, 1857, in favor of Newcomb Cleveland for $111,727.31; (3) another in the Circuit Court of Milwaukee County, in the spring of 1858, in favor of Sebra Howard for $25,000; and (4) another in the last named court in favor of the Mercantile Bank of Hartford, Conn., on the 12th of June, 1858, for $25,000.

On the first of June, 1858, the company, being embarrassed by a large floating debt, and by its obligations to persons who had mortgaged their farms to aid in building its road, determined to issue other bonds to the amount of $2,000,000, and secure them by another mortgage on its entire line of road between La Crosse and Milwaukee, subject to the prior mortgage incumbrances. Accordingly, the mortgage now in suit was executed to William Barnes, Trustee, on the 21st of June, 1858, to secure such an issue. It covered "All the property, real and personal, of said railroad company to be acquired hereafter, as well as that which has been already acquired, together with all the rights, liberties, privileges and franchises of said railroad company in respect to said railroad from Milwaukee to La Crosse," except its land grant, but subject to all the prior mortgages above referred to. Afterwards, on the 11th of August, 1858, a mortgage supplemental to this was executed by way of further assurance. The mortgages thus executed contained a provision that if there should be default in the payment of interest for the space of fifteen days the principal should become due and the Trustee, on the request of the holders of bonds to the amount of $100,000, should advertise and sell the mortgaged property.

Afterwards the following judgments were recovered against the company; namely, 1, one in favor of Edwin C. Litchfield, in the District Court of the United States for the District of [4] Wisconsin, October 5, 1858, for $26,353.51; 2, another in the same court, April 5, 1859, in favor of Nathaniel S. Bouton for $7,937.37; 3, another in favor of Philip S. Justice and others, in the Circuit Court of the County of Milwaukee, for $2,035.33; and 4, another in the last named court, in favor of E. Bradford Greenleaf, September 10, 1858, for $840.86.

At the time when the mortgage to Barnes was executed, the Revised Statutes of Wisconsin, section 33, chapter 79, provided that, in case of any sale of a railroad "On or by virtue of any trust deed, or on any foreclosure of any mortgage thereupon, the party or parties acquiring the title under any such sale, and their associates, successors, and assigns, shall have and acquire thereby, and shall exercise and enjoy thereafter all and the same rights, privileges, grants, franchises, immunities, and advantages in and by said mortgage or trust deed enumerated and conveyed which belonged to and were enjoyed by the company," so far as they relate to the property bought, in all respects the same as "such company might or could have done therefor had no such sale or purchase taken place; such purchaser or purchasers, their associates, successors, and assigns, may proceed to organize anew and elect directors, distribute and dispose of stock, take the same or another name, and may conduct their business generally under and in the manner provided in the charter of such railroad company, with such variations in manner and form of organization as their altered circumstances and better convenience may seem to require."

Afterwards, on the 8th of February, 1859, an Act supplementary to chapter 79 of the Revised Statutes was passed, by which it was provided that in case of any sale of a railroad in the State under a deed of trust, or on a foreclosure, if no one bid an amount equal to 75 per cent of the mortgage debt, the trustee might bid that amount or more, in his discretion, to the full amount of the debt and interest due, if competition should make it necessary; and that the estate so acquired by the trustee should "be held in trust for the holders of the outstanding bonds or obligations in the same manner as if they had become the purchasers, in proportion to the amount of such bonds or obligations severally held by them." Laws of [5] Wis. 1859, chap. 10, p. 18.

On the 11th of the same month of February holders of the bonds secured by the mortgage in favor of Barnes, to the amount of more than $100,000, presented to him their request in writing that he proceed to sell under his trust, and that he purchase the property at the sale for the bondholders at the price of 75 per cent of the outstanding bonds and past due interest, and more if necessary, not exceeding the full amount of the debt, principal and interest. Accordingly he advertised the property for sale pursuant to the provisions of his mortgage, and on the 21st of May, 1859, bought it under the authority of the Act of February 8, 1859, and the request which had been made, at the price of $1,593,333.33, for the benefit of the bondholders. Two days afterwards he united with certain persons representing themselves to be the owners of bonds to the amount of $1,802,850 in the organization of the Milwaukee and Minnesota Company, hereafter called the Minnesota Company, under section 33, chapter 79, of the Revised Statutes, to own and operate the railroad, and by the same instrument he transferred his purchase to the company. The capital stock was fixed at $2,500,000, and the articles of organization contained the following provisions in reference thereto:

"Article IV. The stockholders of the said Milwaukee and Minnesota Railroad Company are the holders of the said bonds, secured by the said mortgages or trust deeds, for whose benefit the said sale and purchase was made by the said William Barnes, and such other persons as shall hereafter associate themselves with them by subscription to the said capital stock or other proper means.

"Each holder of the said bonds, upon surrendering his bonds to the proper officer of the said Milwaukee and Minnesota Railroad Company, shall be entitled to receive a certificate of stock in the company hereby organized of an equal amount with the principal of the bonds so surrendered by him, subject, nevertheless, to the payment in money of the pro rata share of the costs, charges, and expenses of the said sale
[6] and of the organization, and of carrying the same into effect, being the proportion of the whole of such costs, charges, and expenses as the amount of stock so to be issued shall bear to two millions of dollars.

"Article V. The payment of the said pro rata share of such costs, charges, and expenses is hereby declared to be a charge and lien upon the stock to which each holder of the said bonds is entitled. And the board of directors of the said Milwaukee and Minnesota Railroad Company shall have power to declare the right to such stock forfeited by the nonpayment of such pro rata share of such costs, charges and expenses, in such manner as the said board of directors shall determine."

On the 5th of December, 1859, a bill was filed in the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin, by Bronson and others, trustees, against the La Crosse Company, the Minnesota Company, Helfenstein, trustee, and Cleveland and Chamberlain, judgment creditors, to foreclose the land grant mortgage on the Western Division, and on the 9th of the same month a like bill was filed in the same court against the same parties by Bronson and Soutter, trustees, to foreclose the mortgage to them on the Eastern Division. Under the bill for the foreclosure of the land grant mortgage, the Western Division was sold April 25, 1863, to purchasers who organized themselves, pursuant to section 33, chap. 79 of the Revised Statutes, into a corporation by the name of the Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, to which the property so purchased was duly conveyed. This company will be hereafter referred to as the St. Paul Company.

In the suit for the foreclosure of the mortgage on the Eastern Division such proceedings were had, that a receiver was appointed, who took possession of the mortgaged property, under an order of the court, and caused it to to be operated by the St. Paul Company, in connection with the Western Division. Afterwards, on the 18th of July, 1865, it was adjudged in this suit that the Minnesota Company, upon the payment of the amount ascertained to be due on the Bronson and Soutter mortgage for interest, be permitted to redeem and take possession of the Eastern Division and the rolling stock which belonged to it. On the 28th of September, 1865, a decree was entered [7] finding due upon the mortgage $1,000,000 of principal and $454,987.39 of interest, and ordering a sale of the mortgaged property for its payment, but saving the right of the Minnesota Company to redeem in the manner specified in the order of July 18. On the third of January, 1866, this company paid into the registry of the court the amount of money required to make the redemption. Thereupon all further proceedings under this suit for foreclosure were stopped, and on the 20th of January, 1866, the Eastern Division and its rolling stock were handed over by the receiver to the possession of the Minnesota Company.

On the 18th of April, 1866, Frederick P. James, claiming to be the assignee of the judgment against the La Crosse Company in favor of Newcomb Cleveland for $111,727.71, which had been recovered prior to the execution of the mortgage to Barnes, commenced a suit in equity in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin against the Minnesota Company, to enforce the lien of that judgment on the Eastern Division, as being superior to the title acquired by the company through the sale under the Barnes mortgage. Such proceedings were had in this suit that, on the 11th of January, 1867, a decree was entered finding due to James on this judgment $98,801.51, and ordering a sale of the Eastern Division for its payment, subject, however, to the liens of the mortgages prior to that of Barnes and to the lien of the Chamberlain judgment. Under this decree the property was sold and conveyed to the St. Paul Company, March 2, 1867, for $100,920.94, and from that time that company has been in possession, claiming title adversely to the Minnesota Company and to the Barnes mortgage.

On the 20th of April, 1868, while the suit for the foreclosure of the Bronson and Soutter mortgage was pending, and a few days before the sale of the Western Division under the foreclosure of the land grant mortgage, Frederick P. James and Abram M. Brewer, claiming to be the assignees of the judgments in favor of Edwin C. Litchfield and Nathaniel S. Bouton, against the La Crosse Company, which had been recovered after the execution of the Barnes [8] mortgage, and Philip S. Justice and others, and E. Bradford Greenleaf, also judgment creditors, brought suit in the Circuit Court of the United States against the La Crosse Company, the Minnesota Company, and Selah Chamberlain, to set aside the mortgage to Barnes, and his foreclosure thereunder, and to have the property sold free of that incumbrance for the payment of their judgments. In that suit a decree was rendered July 9, 1868, in accordance with the prayer of the bill, save only that the mortgage was adjudged to be valid to the extent of the bonds that had been actually negotiated by the company to bona fide holders. No further proceedings have been had in that suit, and no attempt has ever been made to carry the decree into execution.

Such being the conceded facts, Barnes, as Trustee, brought this suit in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin, on the 6th of June, 1878, against the St. Paul Company, which had changed its name to that of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, the La Crosse Company, and the Minnesota Company, for the foreclosure of his mortgage. In his bill he alleges, as to the first foreclosure: 1, that it had been actually adjudged, in the suit of James and others, to have been fraudulent and null and void, and that the St. Paul Company is estopped from asserting to the contrary, because that suit was brought by its procurement and was in fact prosecuted by it and in its behalf, although in the names of James and his associates; and 2, because the bondholders insist that the deeds of trust, "and the powers in trust conferred thereby, remain unimpaired and as they were before said proceedings for sale were had, * * * because they say:

"1. The said estate was a trust, and a trust can never be terminated without the consent of the cestuis que trust except by its due execution.

"2. Because the powers of sale granted by said deeds to your orator are powers in trust, and, not having been executed in conformity with the requirements of the deeds by which they were granted, remain unexecuted.

"3. Because the said Act, chapter 79, being repugnant to the Constitution of the United [9]
States, no proper and legal execution of said powers could be made under its authority.

"4. Because the terms and conditions prescribed by the Act were not complied with, and therefore, even if the Act were valid, the said powers still remain powers in trust unexecuted;" and it was insisted "that no number of bondholders less than the whole number entitled to the estate granted to your orator by said deeds of trust as security could, under section 33 of the statute laws of Wisconsin aforesaid, legally organize a corporation and vest in it the title to said estate, and so deprive bondholders not consenting thereto of their security, and that, inasmuch as bondholders to a large amount did not consent to the said sale and organization, the same were null and void."

As to the proceedings in the suits for the foreclosure of the land grant mortgage, and for the enforcement of the lien of the Cleveland judgment under which the St. Paul Company acquired title, the material averment, in the view we take of the case, is that "the said Minnesota Company, so called, had no title to said estate, called the third mortgage, conveyed to him (Barnes) by said deeds of trust, which could be barred by said decree of foreclosure of said land grant mortgage, or by said decree of foreclosure, in the name of said James, upon the said Cleveland judgment; and that, your orator retaining his title to said estate, and not being a party to said foreclosure sales, the said estate has ever remained, and now remains, in him, for the benefit of said cestuis que trust, said decrees and said pretenses of the said defendants notwithstanding."

To this bill the St. Paul Company filed a plea, setting up the original foreclosure, "with the knowledge, consent, and approval, and at the request of the bondholders;" the purchase at the sale by Barnes in trust for the bondholders, in accordance with the provisions of the Act of February 8, 1859; the organization of the Minnesota Company for the purposes and with the powers above stated; and the transfer of the property thereto. The plea then proceeds as follows:

"That thereupon said bondholders surrendered their bonds to said corporation to be canceled, and the same were so canceled, and the [10] said corporation thereupon issued to said several bondholders in exchange for their said bonds the corporate stock of said Milwaukee and Minnesota Railroad Company to an amount equal to the principal of said bonds so surrendered in pursuance of said articles of organization, and which said stock was so received by said bondholders in full satisfaction and payment of their said bonds, and that all of the bonds issued by said La Crosse and Milwaukee Railroad Company under said mortgages or trust deeds were then, at the organization of said Milwaukee and Minnesota Railroad Company, or subsequently thereto, so surrendered to said corporation to be canceled, and were canceled, and stock of said company issued therefor.

"That by the proceedings aforesaid the said mortgages or trust deeds so as aforesaid given to said William Barnes were foreclosed and the right of redemption theretofore existing in the said La Crosse and Milwaukee Railroad Company to redeem said property from the lien of said mortgagees or trust deeds was thereby barred and foreclosed, and the said mortgage interest, so as aforesaid conveyed by said mortgages or trust deeds to said William Barnes, became an absolute estate in fee simple to all of the property covered by said mortgages or trust deeds in the said Milwaukee and Minnesota Railroad Company, subject to the prior liens thereon, and that thereby the trust relation to said property created by said mortgages or trust deeds between the said William Barnes and the holders of the bonds issued under said mortgages or trust deeds ended, and that no trust relation in respect to said property now exists, or has existed since the filing of said articles of organization, between said William Barnes and said bondholders."

It is then alleged that the Minnesota Company was made a party to the several suits under which the St. Paul Company claims title; that it appeared therein and "was recognized and treated as the owner of the equity of redemption of said property by virtue of the aforesaid proceedings;" and that, "By means of the proceedings aforesaid, the said William Barnes ceased to have any right, title, or interest as Trustee as aforesaid in, to, or upon or under [11] the said alleged mortgages or trust deeds, and his said bondholders ceased to have any right, title, or interest in, to, or upon the premises described therein and purporting to be affected thereby, and at the time of filing said bill of complaint the said William Barnes had no right, title, estate, lien, claim, demand or equity of redemption, as Trustee or otherwise, of, in, to, or upon the premises described in the said mortgages or trust deeds."

This plea was set down for argument and sustained by the court; whereupon a replication was filed and proofs taken. After hearing, an interlocutory decree was entered April 21, 1882, finding that $1,010,400 of the bonds had been actually exchanged for stock in the Minnesota Company; that $693,000 had either been canceled by the company before their issue, or had been surrendered by their owners for cancellation, and had actually been canceled, after being issued; and that $37,400, belonging to the St. Paul Company, were then in court, and for which no claim was made under the trust. The total amount thus accounted for was $1,740,880; and as to these, it was adjudged that they constituted no valid claim against the La Crosse Company under the mortgage, and that so far as they were concerned, the plea of the St. Paul Company was sustained, and Barnes was entitled to no relief. As to the remaining $259,200 of bonds provided for in the mortgage, a reference was made to a master to inquire and report what, if any, were justly due and in equity entitled to payment out of the mortgage security. Under this reference the master took testimony and reported in favor of the following persons and for the following amounts:

1. Matthew H. Robinson, one bond, $100, on which was due for principal and interest	$417 55
2. Frederick Van Wyck, assignee of William H. Sisson, 2 bonds, $1,000, on which was due for principal and interest	4,175 50
3. A. S. Bright and A. C. Gunnison, 22 bonds, $10,900, on which was due for principal and interest	45,512 95 [12]
4. Andrew J. Riker, 8 bonds, $800, on which was due for principal and interest	3,340 40
5. August F. Suelflohn, 4 bonds, $800, on which was due for principal and interest	3,340 40
6. M. M. Comstock, 2 bonds, $200, on which was due for principal and interest	835 10
7. Mary Christie Emmons, 2 bonds, $200, on which was due for principal and interest	835 10
8. Reid & Smith, 19 bonds, $6,400, on which was due for principal and interest	26,723 20
9. J. H. Tesch, 11 bonds, $1,100, on which was due for principal and interest	4,593 05
In all, bonds $21,500—due	$89,773 35

To this report exceptions were filed, which the court, after hearing, "being of opinion that said claims do not constitute under the mortgages * * * a valid lien upon the property," sustained and dismissed the bill. From a decree to that effect this appeal was taken.

The ultimate question for determination is whether Barnes, the Trustee, and the bondholders secured by the mortgage to him, are bound by the decrees in the suits for the enforcement of the prior liens; namely, the land grant mortgage, and the Cleveland judgment, to which the Minnesota Company was a party. That depends on the legal effect of what was done by Barnes in 1859, for the purpose of foreclosing his mortgage and organizing the Minnesota Company to take the property, under his purchase at that sale, in trust for the bondholders. It is now alleged that this was all null and void: 1, because it has been so adjudged in the suit brought by James and others; and 2, because the Act of February 8, 1859, under which Barnes acted in buying at his own sale and organizing the company, was unconstitutional in its application to his mortgage, which was executed before its passage, and the bonds secured thereby. The claim is that a purchase by Barnes himself at his own sale, without the payment of his bid in money, could not operate as a fore-[13] closure of the mortgage, except with the consent of all the bondholders, which was never given.

The sufficiency of the first of these objections is to be determined by the averments in the bill, taken in connection with the exhibits to which they relate. As to the second, the St. Paul Company pleads in substance that Barnes, in foreclosing his mortgage and in organizing the Minnesota Company after his purchase, acted "with the knowledge, consent, and approval, and at the request of the bondholders."

1. As to the decree in the suit of James and others. The copy of the bill in that suit, which is one of the exhibits in this case, shows that it was filed by certain judgment creditors of the La Crosse Company to collect their judgments. It is a creditor's bill, pure and simple, brought by James and his associates, "on their own behalf, and in behalf of all the creditors of the La Crosse and Milwaukee Railroad Company, who have or claim a lien upon the railroad of said company," and "who shall come in and seek relief by and contribute to the expenses of this suit," to obtain a sale of "all of the property, real and personal, franchises and privileges of the La Crosse and Milwaukee Railroad Company, or which was theirs at the time of said sale by Barnes, May 21, 1859," "subject to the prior claims" described in the mortgage to Barnes, "and that the proceeds of said sale be brought into court, to be divided according to the legal priorities of your orators and the other claimants thereto." It alleges, in substance, that the mortgage to Barnes was executed "for the purpose and with the design of bringing about a speedy sale of said road and its franchises, and cutting off the stockholders in said company, and to hinder, delay and defraud the creditors of the said La Crosse * * * Company, and passing the property in or to the road and its franchises to some of the directors of said company and their friends." The La Crosse Company, although nominally a party to the suit, did not appear and did not ask relief, and there is no pretense that the com-
[14] plainants either did or could prosecute the suit in behalf of the stockholders. If, as is alleged, the St. Paul Company was the promoter as well as the real prosecutor of the suit, it is bound only to the extent it would be if it had been actually the complainant. The most that can be claimed in this behalf is that it stands in the place of the complainants named in the bill, and is bound as they are bound; no more, no less.

The decree—which, with the opinion of Mr. Justice Nelson announcing the judgment of this court in James v. R. R. Co. 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 753 [18: 886], is one of the exhibits in this case—adjudges that the mortgage to Barnes was good and valid "As a security for the bonds issued under it in the hands of bona fide holders for value, without notice," which, it was found, did not exceed $200,000; that the foreclosure and sale be "set aside, vacated and annulled," and the Minnesota Company be "perpetually restrained and enjoined from setting up any right or title under it," because it was made in pursuance of a notice claiming that $2,000,000 of bonds had been issued, and there was default in the payment of $70,000 of interest when less than $200,000 had ever been negotiated to bona fide holders, and the foreclosure proceeding was in other respects irregular and fraudulent; and that all the right, title, interest, and claim which the La Crosse Company had in the railroad from Milwaukee to Portage City be sold to pay the judgments in favor of the complainants, "unless prior to such sale the defendants pay to said complainants" the amounts due thereon.

Every decree in a suit in equity must be considered in connection with the pleadings, and, if its language is broader than is required, it will be limited by construction so that its effect shall be such, and such only, as is needed for the purposes of the case that has been made and the issues that have been decided. Graham v. R. R. Co. 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 704 [18:247]. Here the suit was by and for creditors to set aside the mortgage to Barnes and the foreclosure thereunder, because made and had to hinder and delay them in the collection of their debts. The decree, therefore, although broader in its terms, must be held to mean no more than that the foreclosure was void as to these creditors, whose claims were inferior in right to that of the mortgage, and that the Minnesota Company was restrained and enjoined from asserting title as against them; and also that, if they undertook to sell their property to pay their judgments, the mortgage to Barnes should [15] stand only as security for such bonds as had been actually negotiated by the La Crosse Company to bona fide holders.

Such also was the judgment of this court in R. R. Co. v. Soutter, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 517 [20: 543], which was a suit brought by the Minnesota Company, June 4, 1869, to recover back the money it had paid to redeem the mortgage to Bronson and Soutter on the Eastern Division, for the reason that the foreclosure of the mortgage to Barnes was fraudulent and it had been so adjudged in the James suit. In announcing the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice Bradley said, p. 523 [545]: "Who are the complainants? Are they not the very bondholders, self incorporated into a body politic, who, through their trustee and agent, effected a sale which was declared fraudulent and void as against creditors, and made the purchase which has been set aside for that cause? * * * But the complainants are wrong in asserting that the property was not theirs. It was theirs. Their purchase was declared void only as against the creditors of the La Crosse and Milwaukee Railroad Company. In other words, it was only voidable, not absolutely void. By satisfying these creditors they could have kept the property, and their title would have been good, as against all the world. The property was theirs; but, by reason of the fraudulent sale, was subject to the incumbrance of the debts of the La Crosse Company. This was the legal effect of the decree declaring their title void. Therefore, they were, in fact, paying off an incumbrance on their property when they paid into court the money which they are now seeking to recover back."

This being the extent of the legal effect of the James decree, it follows that, if the proceedings by Barnes in 1859 for the foreclosure of his mortgage were sufficient in form, the Minnesota Company represented that mortgage, and the holders of the bonds secured thereby, in the suits to which it was a party brought to enforce the prior liens under which the St. Paul Company claims title, and that both Barnes, the Trustee, and the bondholders are bound by the decrees therein. The La Crosse Company has [16] never disputed the title of the Minnesota Company, and the prior lienholders recognized it as good when they proceeded against the company to enforce their respective rights. The property has been lost, not because the foreclosure was invalid, but because it was all needed to satisfy liens which were prior in right to that of the Barnes mortgage, under which alone the company claims title. When the creditors in the James suit undertake to carry their decree into execution it will be time enough to consider how far they are bound by the decrees in the suits for the enforcement of the prior liens which were all obtained and executed pending their litigation with the company. We are now dealing only with Barnes and the bondholders claiming under him.

2. As to the plea. The bill in effect concedes, as is necessarily true, that if all the bondholders consented to a foreclosure under the Act of February 8, 1859, the purchase of the property by the Trustee for their benefit, and the transfer of title by him to the Minnesota Company as their representative, would be good, even though without such consent it might be bad. The plea alleges such a consent, and also an actual exchange of all the bonds for stock in the company. The material question thus presented is whether the bondholders consented to what was done by the Trustee in their behalf. If they did, it matters not that some have omitted to surrender their bonds for cancellation, and take certificates of stock in exchange. If they assented to what was done they became in law purchasers at the foreclosure sale, and, as such, stockholders in the company which was organized under the statute in their behalf to take the property from their Trustee, and that, too, without any formal surrender of their bonds. Their stock was bound for the payment in money of their respective pro rata shares of the costs, charges, and expenses of the sale, and of the organization of the company and of carrying the same into effect. If they wanted certificates of stock, they were required to surrender their bonds and pay what was due from them on this account, but as bondholders, purchasing through their Trustee, they became, by the express terms of the arti- [17] cles of organization, stockholders in the new Corporation, with a lien on their shares for their proportion of the expenses, etc. The averment in the plea of an actual surrender of bonds for cancellation, and an issue of stock in exchange therefor, presents an immaterial issue. The voluntary exchange of bonds for stock would show a positive assent to the foreclosure, but a failure to do so would not necessarily imply dissent.

The exact issue to be tried, therefore, is whether the necessary consent was actually given. The enabling statute was approved February 8, 1859, and on the 11th of the same month, only three days afterwards, the requisite amount of bondholders presented their request to Barnes that he proceed to foreclose the mortgage and buy the property for the bondholders under the authority thus conferred on him for that purpose. In accordance with this request, he advertised the sale, and made the purchase May 21, 1859. Two days afterwards he organized the company, under the statute, to take the title from him as trustee for those in whose behalf he bought. From that time forward, during all the protracted litigation which ensued, this company claimed to own the property, subject only to the incumbrance of prior liens, and neither Barnes nor any bondholder, so far as this record discloses, ever asserted the contrary until after the James suit was decided, when the St. Paul Company was in possession under its purchases upon decrees for the enforcement of the prior liens in suits to which the company was a party. During all this time the Minnesota Company was active in asserting its title, and its litigation with the prior incumbrancers was constant and energetic, as the records of this court show in Bronson v. La Crosse R. R. Co. 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 405 [17: 616]; S. C. 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 283 [17: 725]; R. R. Co. v. Soutter, Id. 440, 510 [17: 860, 900]; Graham v. R. R. Co. [supra]; R. R. Co. v. Soutter, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 660 [18: 678]; R. R. Co. v. Chamberlain, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 748 [18: 859]; R. R. Co. v. James, Id. 750 [18: 854]; James v. R. R. Co. Id. 752 [18: 885.]

The amount of bonds authorized by the mortgage was $2,000,000. The proof is abundant that of this amount $1,010,400 were actual- [18] ly converted into stock, and that $780,400 had either been surrendered for cancellation because they had never been issued, or because the holders made no claim against the La Crosse Company on their account. The findings of the court below show the particulars as to the whole of these two amounts, and we are entirely satisfied with the correctness of the conclusions there reached. Some of the holders claim that they were persuaded against their own judgment, and, perhaps, against their will, to make the exchange, but still their bonds were actually surrendered and certificates of stock taken in exchange therefor. They kept silent during all the time the litigation with the Minnesota Company was going on, and uttered no complaints until after the James suit was decided against their interest then represented by that company.

There remained, however, at the time of the rendition of the interlocutory decree below, $259,200 of bonds unaccounted for; and a reference was made to a master to receive claims therefor, and to take testimony and report thereon. Under this reference bonds to the amount of $21,500 were presented to and allowed by the master. None of these bonds had been actually surrendered to the company and exchanged for stock; but after a careful examination of the testimony we have no hesitation in deciding that, at the time of the foreclosure, they were held and owned by parties who in law consented thereto, and that the present holders took them with full notice of that fact.

Of the amount allowed by the master, Bright and Gunnison alone represent $17,800, although Reid & Smith have a claim on $6,400 thereof for money advanced. Both Bright and Gunnison were officers in the Minnesota Company, and at times very active in the management of its affairs. Of the bonds which they represent, $7,500 were owned by William E. Cramer at the time of the foreclosure, and he signed the request to Barnes that he sell the property and buy it for the bondholders under the statute. These bonds were bought by Bright and Gunnison, or some person whom they represent, after this suit was begun, [19] Cramer receiving for them $900. The rest of the bonds which they present were undoubtedly owned by them while they were acting as officers of the company, and as such defending the suits for the enforcement of the prior liens, if not at the time of the original foreclosure by Barnes.

Suelflohn, who presents a claim for $800, actually owned his bonds at the time of the foreclosure, and signed the request that was presented to Barnes. Robertson, who claims $100, was a clerk in the office of Barnes when the bonds were issued, during the foreclosure, and for many years afterwards. He received his bond for services in connection with this business. Mary Christie Emmons claims $200 for bonds she got from her father, one of the original organizers of the company, and named in the articles of organization as one of the directors, a position which he occupied for several years afterwards. Maria M. Comstock's claim is for bonds she got from her father, Leander Comstock, who held them at the time of the foreclosure, and who then did and ever since has resided in Milwaukee, and presumably had knowledge of what was being done. Frederick Van Wyck, who claims $1,000, is a son-in-law of Bright; and the bonds he presents were bought by him at the suggestion of his father-in-law from William H. Sisson for a small sum, after they had been filed as a claim by Sisson himself. Sisson was a lawyer in Chicago, but whether he owned the bonds or held them for others does not appear. Andrew J. Riker, who claims $800, was a broker in New York at the time of the foreclosure and before and after. He owned the bonds he now presents at that time, and must have been familiar then with all that occurred, for he held land grant bonds also, and says that after the foreclosure of that mortgage he laid them aside as of no value, because he "thought the thing was all closed up." John H. Tesch, who claims $1,100, held his bonds at the time of the foreclosure. He resided then and since in Milwaukee, and was familiar in a general way with all that was done. He knew of the Barnes foreclosure, though he says: "I did not know that my bonds had anything to do with it; I did not follow that up. It was a common report mentioned in the newspapers, but did not know it concerned me." But before that he had [20] been informed by his counsel that they were good for nothing and would not be paid.

Under these circumstances we cannot do otherwise than decide that the silence of the holders of these few bonds, during all the time the Minnesota Company was acting in their behalf, is equivalent to actual consent to the sale under which the company got the right to represent their interests in the litigation with the prior lienholders. They are the only persons, so far as the record discloses, who did not actually surrender their bonds and take certificates of stock therefor; and it is now too late for them to say that what their Trustee did in their behalf was without authority. There cannot be a doubt that they knew of the foreclosure at or near the time it took place. If the purchase was not made for their benefit under the Act of 1879, the Trustee was accountable to them in money for their proportion of what he bid for the property. For this they never applied, and it must, therefore, be assumed that he bought for their account, as well as that of the other bondholders, and that they assented thereto.

It follows that the plea has been sustained by the evidence, and this necessarily disposes of all the other questions in the case. The sale by Barnes to the company under the foreclosure devested him of title and of his right to bring suit in behalf of bondholders. The decree in the James suit did not dissolve the Minnesota Company. It simply established the right of the judgment creditors who brought that suit to redeem the Barnes mortgage, by paying the amount due for bonds that had been actually negotiated by the La Crosse Company to bona fide holders, and to have the mortgaged property sold subject to such a lien. The company still continued in existence and still owned the property that had been bought, subject only to the inferior liens of the creditors whose rights had been established.

Neither can Barnes now take advantage of the alleged frauds or irregularities in the foreclosures of the prior liens. He not only has no title under which he could proceed for that purpose, but all such questions were settled and finally disposed of in the decrees to which [21] the Minnesota Company was a party.

So, also, of the claim which was made before the master to recover back the money paid to redeem the Bronson and Soutter mortgage. That money was paid by the Minnesota Company, and that company alone can sue for its recovery. Such a suit was once brought and a decree rendered against the company.

The decree of the Circuit Court dismissing the bill was right, and it is consequently affirmed.

STATE OF MISSOURI, ex rel. JOHN F. GUFFEY, Collector of Revenue of PUTNAM COUNTY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 561-575.)

Constitutional law—railroads—immunity from taxation does not pass upon a sale under Missouri Act of 1870—obligation of contract—impairment of.

1. The Missouri Act of March 24, 1870, subjects to state taxation any railroad in that State, or such part thereof as is located therein, if a railroad corporation of another State purchases, leases, or makes arrangements for operating it.
2. The absolute sale by the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company of its road, with its property, rights, privileges and franchises, under the authority of the Act of 1870, passed them to its grantee, the Burlington and Southwestern Railway Company, subject to the condition that its road, in Missouri, so sold, should thereafter be subject to taxation, notwithstanding the immunity from taxation contained in the charter of 1857 of said former company.
3. The Act of 1870 does not impair the obligation of any contract, which the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company had, by its charter, with the State of Missouri, touching the right of said company to sell its road.

Submitted April 4, 1887. Decided May 23, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri. On petition for rehearing. Denied.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court. See the opinion of this court at the former hearing, ante, 782.

Messrs. L. T. Hatfield and A. W. Mullins, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. B. G. Boone, Atty-Gen. for Missouri, and S. P. Huston, for defendant in error.

[569] Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

The opinion heretofore delivered in this case is reported in 120 U. S. 569 [ante, 782]. We are now asked by the plaintiff in error to grant a rehearing; chiefly, upon the ground that this court assumed that the only question necessary to be determined was as to "The liability to taxation, in Missouri, for state and county purposes, of what was formerly known as the Central North Missouri Branch of the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad, more recently named the Linneus Branch of the Burlington and Southwestern Railway Company, and now owned by the Chicago, Burlington and Kansas City Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Missouri." The property, upon which the assessment in question was made, is described in the pleadings in such general terms that it is impossible to ascertain how much of it belongs to what is called the Linneus Branch, and how much to what is described in the petition for rehearing as the "main line" of the company.

The Supreme Court of Missouri, as appears from its opinion in the record, after referring to the purchase made in 1871 by the Burlington and Southwestern Railway Company, an Iowa corporation, of the main line and the property, rights, privileges, and franchises of the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company, said: "Afterwards, and in 1872, the directors [570] of the Burlington Company, acting by the direction of the stockholders of the branch road, then called the Linneus Branch, placed upon the branch road a mortgage to secure certain bonds. The main line had been previously mortgaged. The defendant purchased the branch road through a foreclosure sale had upon the mortgage thereon. The taxes in suit were assessed upon this branch road property." Again; "If, as we have seen, the Burlington Company does not acquire the immunity from taxation, it is difficult to see how any branch built by it could take on the exemption."

Assuming, from the language of the court below, that the only taxes in suit were those assessed upon the branch road property, we restricted our decision to the single question as to the liability to taxation of branch roads established under the Act of March 21, 1868, entitled "An Act to Aid in the Building of Branch Roads in the State of Missouri;" holding that roads constructed under that statute came, so far as taxation was concerned, under the operation of the clause of the Missouri Constitution of 1865, which declares that "No property, real or personal, shall be exempt from taxation, except such as may be used exclusively for public schools, and such as may belong to the United States, to the State, to counties, or to municipal corporations."

It is now claimed—and we understand the Attorney-General of Missouri, in effect, to concede—that the taxes in question were in fact laid, not only upon the Linneus Branch lying in Putnam County, but upon that part of the defendant's "main line" which extends from Unionville, in the same county, to the boundary line between Missouri and Iowa. We are, therefore, asked to determine whether or not the last described part of the defendant's road is not exempt from taxation for state and county purposes. To this request we yield, not only because it is now, in effect, conceded that that question is covered by the pleadings, but because of the suggestion that other cases are pending in the courts of the State which, by stipulation of the parties, are to abide the determination of the one now before us.

This claim of immunity from taxation, in respect to the road between Unionville and the [571. Iowa line, is upon these grounds: 1, that, by the charter of the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company, granted in 1857, it is provided that "The stock of said company shall be exempt from all state and county taxes;"* 2, that such exemption, in law, extends to the property of that corporation, as represented by its stock; 3, that the defendant, a corporation of Missouri, and the successor of the Burlington and Southwestern Railway Company, is entitled to the benefit of the exemption granted to the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company by its charter of 1857.

Conceding, for this case, that the exemption from taxation of the stock of the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company necessarily embraced the property of the corporation, the question still remains, whether that immunity passed to the Burlington and Southwestern Railway Company by its purchase in 1871. The determination of that question depends upon the construction and effect to be given to the second section of an Act of the General Assembly of Missouri approved March 24, 1870. That section became section 57 of article 2, chapter 37, of Wagner's Statutes of Missouri of 1872, and is as follows:

"Any railroad company heretofore incorporated or hereafter organized in pursuance of law, may, at any time, by means of subscription to the capital stock of any other railroad company, or otherwise, aid such company in the construction of its railroad, within or without the State, for the purpose of forming a connection of the last mentioned road with the road owned by the company furnishing such aid; or any such railroad company, which may have built its road to the boundary line of the State, may extend into the adjoining State, and for that purpose may build, or buy, or lease a railroad [572] in such adjoining State, and operate the same, and may own such real estate and other property in such adjoining State as may be convenient in operating such road; or any railroad company organized in pursuance of the laws of this or any other State, or of the United States, may lease or purchase all or any part of a railroad, with all its privileges, rights, franchises, real estate and other property, the whole or a part of which is in this State, and constructed, owned, or leased by any other company, if the lines of the said road or roads of said companies are continuous or connected at a point either within or without the State, upon such terms as may be agreed upon between said companies respectively; or any railroad company, duly incorporated and existing under the laws of an adjoining State, or of the United States, may extend, construct, maintain and operate its railroad into and through this State, and for that purpose shall possess and exercise all the rights, powers and privileges conferred by the general laws of this State upon railroad corporations organized thereunder, and shall be subject to all the duties, liabilities, and provisions of the laws of this State concerning railroad corporations as fully as if incorporated in this State; Provided, That no such aid shall be furnished, nor any purchase, lease, subletting, or arrangements perfected, until a meeting of the stockholders of said company or companies of this State, party or parties to such agreement, whereby a railroad in this State may be aided, purchased, leased, sublet, or affected by such arrangement, shall have been called by the directors thereof, at such time and place, and in such manner, as they shall designate, and the holders of a majority of the stock of such company, in person or by proxy, shall have assented thereto, or until the holders of a majority of the stock of such company shall have assented thereto in writing, and a certificate thereof, signed by the president and secretary of said company or companies, shall have been filed in the office of the Secretary of State; And provided, further, That if a railroad company of another State shall lease a railroad, the whole or a part of which is in this State, or make arrangements for operating the same as provided in this Act, or shall extend its railroad into this [573] State, or through this State, such part of said railroad as is within this State shall be subject to taxation, and shall be subject to all regulations and provisions of law governing railroads in this State, and a corporation in this State leasing its road to a corporation of another State shall remain liable as if it operated the road itself, and a corporation of another State, being a lessee of a railroad in this State, shall likewise be held liable for the violation of any of the laws of this State, and may sue and be sued, in all cases and for the same causes, and in the same manner as a corporation of this State might sue or be sued if operating its own road; but a satisfaction of any claim or judgment by either of said corporations shall discharge the other; and a corporation of another State, being the lessee as aforesaid, or extending its railroad as aforesaid, into or through this State, shall establish and maintain an office or offices in this State, at some point or points on the line of the road so leased or constructed and operated, at which legal process and notice may be served as upon railroad corporations of this State."

As the proposed lines of the Burlington and Southwestern Railway Company and the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company would, when constructed, make a connected or continuous line from Burlington, Iowa, to St. Joseph, Missouri, the authority of the former corporation, under the Act of 1870, to purchase or lease the road of the latter, cannot be doubted.

But, as we have seen, the Act expressly declares that if a railroad corporation of another State leases a railroad, the whole or part of which is in Missouri, or makes arrangements for operating the same as provided in that Act, such part of that railroad, as is within the latter State, "shall be subject to taxation." Great stress is laid by counsel on the fact that, while the Act authorizes a foreign corporation to "lease or purchase" a railroad, the whole or part of which is in Missouri, the word "purchase" is not used in the proviso relating to taxation. It is therefore argued that, while the Legislature intended to subject to taxation railroads in Missouri which were leased, after the passage of the Act of 1870, to corporations of other States, it did not intend to tax railroads, [574] in that State, which were purchased outright by corporations of other States. That construction of the Act is inadmissible. If supported by the mere letter of the statute, it is inconsistent with the manifest object which the Legislature had in view; namely, to subject to taxation railroad property in Missouri which passes under the control of a corporation of another State, whether by purchase or by lease, or by "arrangements for operating the same, as provided" in the Act of 1870. The State had the right to prescribe, as a condition upon which the road, property, franchises, and privileges of the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company might be placed, by any of those modes, under the control of a railroad corporation of another State, that such property, after being so transferred, should be subject to taxation. Whether such a condition could be imposed upon a corporation having the right, by its charter, before the Act of 1870, to make an absolute sale of its road, privileges, and franchises, and to pass to the purchaser whatever immunities from taxation it then enjoyed, we do not decide. No such question is now presented.

It is, however, claimed—such we think is the effect of the argument in behalf of the company—that the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company, for the purpose of enabling it "to construct, equip, and operate said road," had the power, by its charter, as amended November 5, 1857, "to pledge the said road, rolling stock, machinery, depots, and any other property they may possess, together with the franchises of said road, for the liquidation of any indebtedness said railroad company may incur in the construction of said road." Mo. Acts, 1857, p. 73 § 8. This power to pledge, it may be insisted, could not legally be affected or modified by the Act of 1870, although that Act took effect before any mortgage was put upon the main line. In answer to such suggestions, it is sufficient to say that the restricted power of the company thus to pledge its property and franchises for the liquidation of indebtedness incurred in the construction of its road, did not authorize it to make, in the first instance, an absolute sale of its property, rights, privileges, and franchises, to a corporation of another State. The power to make the absolute deed [575] of 1871 to the Burlington and Southwestern Railway Company was given by the Act of 1870, and does not appear to have existed before that time. In no view of the case, therefore, were the conditions prescribed by that Act in violation of any right possessed by the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company under its charter. If that corporation elected to make an absolute sale of its road, with its property, rights, privileges, and franchises, under the authority given by the Act of 1870, they passed to its grantee, subject to the condition that its road, in Missouri, so sold, should thereafter be subject to taxation.

Without pursuing the subject further, we are satisfied with the construction we have heretofore given to the Act of 1868. And we are also of opinion that the Act of 1870, as in this opinion interpreted, does not impair the obligation of any contract, which the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company had, by its charter, with the State of Missouri.

The rehearing is denied, and the judgment of affirmance, heretofore entered, must, upon the grounds stated in this and the original opinion, stand as the judgment of this court.

Denied.

[563] SUN MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW ORLEANS, ET AL., Appts.,
v.
THE KOUNTZ LINE, The H. C. YEAGER TRANSPORTATION COMPANY, ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 563-597.)

Partnership—when one not a partner may be charged as such—steamboats owned by different corporations under one management—joint liability of owners—practice.

1. A person who is not in fact a partner, who has no interest in the partnership business, and does not share in its profits, and is sought to be charged for debts because of having held himself out, or permitted himself to be held out, as a partner, may be so charged generally if the holding out has been so public and so long continued as to justify the inference, as matter of fact, that one dealing with the partnership knew it and relied upon it, without direct testimony to that effect.

2. In the case presented, certain transportation companies, each owning a steamboat, placed their boats, or permitted them to be placed, before the public as being engaged in the same trade, and as constituting, together, the "Kountz Line," that being the name of another corporation which acted as agent of said owners of the boats, fully authorized to represent them, and each of them, in respect to matters connected with such business. Upon a libel in personam, filed by certain insurance Companies, which had become subrogated to the rights of the owners of merchandise lost by the sinking of one of said boats, to charge said companies jointly for the value of said merchandise, it is held: that said Companies held themselves out as united in a joint enterprise, under the name of the "Kountz Line," and that they are jointly liable for the default or negligence of those placed in charge of any of the boats of that line.

*Argued Jan. 17, 18, 1887. Decided May 23, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. See 4 Woods, 268. Reversed, but petition for rehearing allowed to be filed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John A. Campbell and O. B. Sansum, for appellants.

Messrs. Richard H. Browne and Charles B. Singleton, for appellees.

Mr. J. R. Beckwith, of counsel for intervening libelants.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion [584] of the court:

This is a libel in admiralty and in personam. The libelants are Insurance Companies, which issued policies covering certain produce and merchandise delivered May 21, 1880, on board the steamboat Henry C. Yeager, at St. Louis, Missouri, for transportation to the City of New Orleans and other ports on the Mississippi River; which cargo was lost by the sinking of the boat the day succeeding its departure from St. Louis. The Yeager was unseaworthy, both at the commencement of her voyage and at the time of the loss. The sinking and the loss were the direct consequence of such unseaworthiness.

The libelants having paid to the owners of the cargo the damages sustained by them—$31,720.10—and having been subrogated to all the rights and claims of the latter on account of such loss, brought this suit against the appellees jointly to recover the amount so paid. In the district court, the attachments sued out by the libelants were discharged, and the libel dismissed. In the circuit court, it was adjudged that there was no joint liability on the part of the respondents, or any of them, and that liability for the loss of the cargo was alone upon The Yeager, and her owner, the H. C. Yeager Transportation Company. As to all the other respondents, the libel was dismissed. Of that decree the libelants complain, the principal assignment of error being that the court erred in not holding the respondents, or some of them, jointly liable for the loss of the cargo.

*NOTE.—On the last day of the term, May 27th, upon a petition filed by William J. Kountz, praying that the case be retained on the docket and assigned for argument again at some pr per day of the next term, or that time be allowed him to present at the next term a motion for a rehearing in the case, the court ordered that the mandate be withheld until the next term, and granted leave to file a petition for rehearing.

The general ground upon which this contention is placed is that the shipment of May 21, 1880, on The Henry C. Yeager was a part of the general business of transportation in which the H. C. Yeager Transportation Company, the C. V. Kountz Transportation Company, the K. P. Kountz Transportation Company, and the M. Moore Transportation Company, were jointly engaged under the name of the "Kountz Line," and, consequently, that said Companies were jointly liable for the loss and damages in [585] question. The decree below proceeded upon the ground that said Companies were not jointly engaged in business, and that the loss must be borne entirely by the Company owning The Henry C. Yeager. Citizens' Ins. Co. v. Kountz Line, 4 Woods, 268.

The determination of the question of joint liability depends upon the facts set out in the finding by the circuit court. Those facts—preserving, in our statement of them, substantially, the language of the court below—are as follows:

In June, 1872, William J. Kountz, John W. King, W. W. Atex, and Charles Scudder, organized, under the laws of Missouri, a Corporation by the name of the Kountz Line, of which they were to be, and did become, directors for the first year; and of which Kountz was president, and King general agent. Its capital stock was fixed at $15,000, divided into shares of $100 each. The declared object of the Corporation was to build or purchase, use or employ, one or more wharf boats for the use of steamboats and other vessels belonging to the stockholders of the Company; to build, purchase, or charter steamboats, towboats, etc., for transporting freight and passengers on the Mississippi River and its tributaries; and to do a general river business. It does not appear that the Kountz Line Corporation owned, at the time of the shipment on The Yeager, or at any time during the year 1880, any steamboat or other water craft, except a wharfboat at St. Louis.

In a few months after the organization of that Corporation; to wit, on the 13th of November, 1872, Kountz, King, and one Sheble, organized, under the laws of Missouri, the four Transportation Companies above named, of each of which Kountz and King were chosen directors, and King treasurer and secretary. Kountz, King, and Sheble, Charles H. Seaman, H. K. Haslitt, and W. P. Braithwaite, having interests, as owners, respectively, in the steamboats Henry C. Yeager, Carrie V. Kountz, Katie P. Kountz, and Mollie Moore, transferred the same, by bills of sale, as follows: The Henry C. Yeager, to the H. C. Yeager Transportation [586] Company; The Carrie V. Kountz, to the Carrie V. Kountz Transportation Company; The Katie P. Kountz, to the K. P. Kountz Transportation Company; and The Mollie Moore, to the M. Moore Transportation Company; the vendors receiving, in consideration of said transfers, stock in the respective Transportation Companies.

Of the stock of the Kountz Line Corporation, on the 6th day of July, 1874, William J. Kountz owned two shares; King, D. C. Brady, Van Hook, and C. H. Seaman, one share each; the steamboats John F. Tolle, Henry C. Yeager, Mollie Moore, and Carrie V. Kountz, 36 shares each. There was no change in the ownership of such stock by those steamboats up to the commencement of this suit, except that the shares held by The John F. Tolle belonged to the steamboat J. B. M. Kehlor, when, on September 14, 1878, the latter was transferred to the M. Moore Transportation Company. W. J. Kountz never, at any time, owned more than two shares in the Kountz Line Corporation, and was a stockholder in all of the Transportation Companies.

On the 15th of January, 1878, W. J. Kountz owned 398 shares, and King and Sheble each one share of the stock of the M. Moore Transportation Company. But, on December 19, 1879, the stock of that Company was held as follows: Katie P. Kountz, a daughter of W. J. Kountz, 397 shares, and Kountz, King and Rogers, each one share. November 4, 1878, Katie P. Kountz held 241¼ shares, her father and King each one share, and Braithwaite 56¼ shares, in the K. P. Kountz Transportation Company. December 19, 1879, Katie P. Kountz held 379 shares, and her father, King and Rogers, each one share in the H. C. Yeager Transportation Company. On the 21st of May, 1880, of the stock of the C. V. Kountz Transportation Company, Katie P. Kountz held 328 shares; Clement Seaman 74 shares; and her father, King and C. H. Seaman, each one share. No subsequent transfers of stock in any of these Companies were made, and, at the time of the shipment on The Yeager, "the stock in no two of said Companies was held by the same person."

It thus appears that, at the time of the shipment on The Yeager, almost all the stock of these Transportation Companies stood in the name of a daughter of William J. Kountz.

It was further found by the court below that [587] the steamboats Carrie V. Kountz, Katie P. Kountz, Henry C. Yeager and Mollie Moore "were employed by the respective Transportation Companies, to which they were conveyed, under the direction of the officers of said Companies, in carrying freight and passengers on the Mississippi and its tributaries," the Kountz Line Corporation being the "common agent" of said Companies, and charging the latter "for the services rendered to them respectively, from one hundred to one hundred and fifty dollars per trip." Its office, as well as the business offices of the Transportation Companies, was in the same room on its wharfboat at St. Louis. It—the Kountz Line Corporation—collected the dues of the Transportation Companies, keeping a separate account with each, and paying to each the earnings of its own steamboat. By means of advertisements in newspapers, placards, handbills, and cards, the Kountz Line Corporation advertised the "Kountz Line," setting forth the advantages offered by the boats of that line, their low rates of freight, etc., and "announced that it was ready to contract for the carrying of goods and passengers by the Kountz Line boats." In those advertisements, placards, and handbills, usually one, but sometimes two or more of the boats belonging to the Transportation Companies, were mentioned "as belonging to said Kountz Line." The Kountz Line Corporation made out bills of freight upon blanks headed "Kountz Line, St. Louis and New Orleans Packet," the bills being "in the name of the particular steamboat to which the freight was due, and the dray tickets of shippers indicating on what boat the goods were to be shipped." The bills of lading were usually signed "John W. King, ag't Kountz Line, St. Louis," the signature thereto being made by a stamp; but the bills were sometimes signed by the clerk of the steamboat on which the goods were shipped. Some of the bills of lading for the produce and merchandise shipped May 21, 1880, on The Yeager, recited "that the same were received from John W. King on board the steamboat Henry C. Yeager, to be delivered to the consignee at New Orleans. In witness whereof, the master, clerk, or agent of said boat [588] hath affirmed to three bills of lading," etc., and were signed, some of them, "John W. King, ag't Kountz Line, St. Louis," and some by E. B. McPherson, clerk. Others of said bills of lading recited the shipping of produce by other shippers on board The Henry C. Yeager, and were signed by King in the manner aforesaid, and others by E. B. McPherson, clerk.

In order that the boats belonging to said Transportation Companies might have freight, the Kountz Line Corporation sometimes purchased produce and merchandise for the purpose of its being shipped upon them, the sum paid for such produce and merchandise being charged to the particular Company in whose interest the purchase was made. The goods so purchased were usually bought and paid for by the Kountz Line Corporation. Against such shipments it made drafts, in its own name, on the consignees. All moneys, whether received for freight carried by said several steamboats or for goods shipped and sold for their account, were remitted to Wm. J. Kountz or John W. King, as the agents of said Kountz Line, the cost of the goods being charged to the individual boat on which they were shipped. After deducting costs and charges, the net proceeds, although "deposited in bank to the credit of said Kountz Line, were placed in the books of account to the credit of the boat carrying the goods, and were her separate profits."

The circuit court found that the Kountz Line and the said Transportation Companies "owned no property in common," and that "there was no community of profits or property between said Companies, including the Kountz Line, or any two or more of them." But it also found that "none of said steamboats were ever advertised by the name of the corporations that owned them," and that from the date of the incorporation of said Transportation Companies to the date of the said shipment on the Henry C. Yeager, "none of said Transportation Companies ever transacted any commercial business by their several and respective names, but the same was done by the name of the Kountz Line, or in the name of the individual boats belonging to said Transportation Companies."

Such, in substance, is the case made by the finding of facts.

It is not claimed that the four Transportation Companies, organized in 1872, can be held jointly liable for the loss of the produce and merchandise shipped on The Yeager by reason of their being, in fact, partners, having a right to participate in the profits of the business conducted by and in the name of the "Kountz Line." They did not share or agree to share the profits or to divide the losses of that business, as a unit. On the other hand, it is not disputed that, according to well settled principles of law, a person not a partner or joint trader may, under some circumstances, be held liable as if he were, in fact, a partner or joint trader. "Where the parties are not in reality partners," says Story, "but are held out to the world as such in transactions affecting third persons," they will be held to be partners as to such persons. Story, Part. § 64. And in Gow on Partnership (p. 4) it is laid down as an undeniable proposition that "Persons appearing ostensibly as joint traders are to be recognized and treated as partners, whatever may be the nature of the agreement under which they act, or whatever motive or inducement may prompt them to such an exhibition." And so it was adjudged in Waugh v. Carver, 2 H. Bl. 235, 246, where it was said by Lord Chief Justice Eyre that if one will lend his name as a partner he becomes, as against all the world, a partner, "not upon the ground of the real transaction between them, but upon principles of general policy to prevent the frauds to which creditors would be liable." We do not mean to say that such liability exists in every case where the person sought to be charged holds himself out as a partner or joint trader with others. The qualifications of the general rule are recognized in Thompson v. First National Bank of Toledo, 111 U. S. 529 [28: 507], where [594] it was held, upon full consideration, that "A person who is not in fact a partner, who has no interest in the business of the partnership, and does not share in its profits, and is sought to be charged for its debts because of having held himself out, or permitted himself to be held out, as a partner, cannot be made liable upon contracts of the partnership, except with those who have contracted with the partnership upon the faith of such partnership." At the same time, the court observed that there may be cases in which the holding out has been so public and so long continued as to justify the inference, as matter of fact, that one dealing with the partnership knew it and relied upon it, without direct testimony to that effect.

As there is no evidence of any direct representation by these Transportation Companies, or any of them, to the shippers of the cargo in question, as to their relations in business with each other, or as to their relations respectively with the Kountz Line Corporation, or the Kountz Line, the inquiry in this case must be whether they so conducted themselves, with reference to the general public, as to induce a shipper, acting with reasonable caution, to believe that they had formed a combination in the nature of a partnership, or were engaged as joint traders, under the name of the Kountz Line.

In our judgment, this question must be answered in the affirmative. It could not, we think, be otherwise answered, consistently with the inferences which the facts reasonably justify.

The finding of facts, as we have seen, show that the steamboats Henry C. Yeager, Katie P. Kountz, Carrie V. Kountz, and Mollie Moore were employed in the business of transporting freights and passengers on the Mississippi and its tributaries. They were placed by their owners, or were permitted by their owners to be placed, before the public as being engaged in the same trade, and as constituting, together, the "Kountz Line." They had a common [595] agent, which was invested with, or was permitted during a series of years to exercise, unlimited authority in their general management, and in respect to rates of transportation. That agent—the Kountz Line Corporation—with the knowledge of the Transportation Companies, publicly announced that it was ready to contract for the carrying of goods and produce by the "Kountz Line boats." We say this was done with the knowledge of the owners of the boats, because the persons conducting the entire business of the Kountz Line boats were officers, with plenary authority of the Transportation Companies and of the Kountz Line Corporation. The court below finds that the Transportation Companies used and employed their several boats in carrying freight and passengers on the Mississippi River and its tributaries. But with the intent, or with the effect, to mislead shippers, they took care, never, by their respective corporate names, to make, or to allow others in their behalf to make, any contracts, or to enter into any engagements, touching such business. It is expressly found that during the whole period from the organization, on the same day in the year 1872, to the date of the shipment on The Yeager in 1880—a period of nearly eight years—they did not transact any commercial business whatever by their respective corporate names. They severally empowered or permitted the Kountz Line Corporation, their common agent, to do business for them, using, in their discretion, when making transportation contracts, either the name of the Kountz Line, composed of all the Companies, or the names of the respective boats of that line. In no instance was business transacted by the Kountz Line Corporation, as representing the particular transportation company owning the boat on which the shipment was made. Those Companies, therefore, stood before the world as having united for the purpose of engaging, in the same trade, under the name and style of the Kountz Line, having a common agent—the Kountz Line Corporation—fully authorized to represent them, and each of them, in respect to matters connected with such business. They held themselves out as united in a joint enterprise, under the name of the Kountz Line, and they are jointly liable for the default or negligence of those placed in charge of any of the boats of that line. That the Transportation Companies owned no property in common, and that [596] each was entitled, as between it and the others, to receive the net earnings of its own boat, is immaterial in view of the fact that they held themselves out, or permitted themselves to be held out, as jointly engaged in the business of transporting freights and passengers, in the same trade, on the Mississippi and its tributaries. So far as the public was concerned, that which was done by their common agent, the Kountz Line Corporation, in the prosecution of the business of the several boats constituting the Kountz Line, is substantially what would have been done had the Transportation Companies entered into a formal agreement to conduct the transportation business jointly, under the name of the "Kounts Line," through an agent having full authority to represent that line, and the several boats composing it, in the making of contracts with shippers. The latter had the right to infer, from all the circumstances, that the boats constituting that Line were jointly engaged in such business.

As there is no serious conflict in the adjudged cases as to the general propositions of law to which we have referred, it would serve no useful purpose to review the authorities to which our attention is invited by counsel. Whether, in a particular case, there has been such a "holding out" as to create joint liability, must always depend upon its special facts. No one of the cases cited resembles the one before us in its facts. This case seems to be unlike any found in the books in the peculiar relations existing between these Transportation Companies, the Kountz Line Corporation, and the stockholders of each of them. We decide nothing more than that, under the facts of this case, the H. C. Yeager Transportation Company, the K. P. Kountz Transportation Company, the Carrie V. Kountz Transportation Company, and the M. Moore Transportation Company, were and are jointly liable for the loss of the produce and merchandise shipped May 21, 1880, on the steamboat Henry C. Yeager. The circuit court erred in not so adjudging.

The decree is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to that court to set aside all [597] orders inconsistent with, and to enter such orders and decree as may be in conformity to the principles of this opinion. Reversed.

ARGENTINE MINING COMPANY, Plf. in Err., [478]
v.
THE TERRIBLE MINING COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 478-486.)

Mining law—location of lode or vein—crossing the course of—end and side lines—patents—exception—instructions—practice.

1. Section 2320, R. S., contemplates that the location of a lode or vein shall be along its course. It is not the intent of the law to allow a person to make his location crosswise of the vein, so that the side lines shall cross it, and thereby give him the right to follow the strike of the vein outside of his side lines. When a mining claim crosses the course of the lode or vein instead of being "along the vein or lode," the end lines are those which measure the width of the claim as it crosses the lode. The side lines are those which measure the extent of the claim on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface.

2. In the case presented it is held: that the lines which separate the location of the plaintiff from the location of the defendant are end lines, across which, as they are extended downward vertically, the defendant cannot follow a vein, even if its apex or outcropping is within its surface boundaries, and as a consequence, could not touch the premises in dispute, which are outside of those lines and outside of the vertical planes drawn downward through them; that the exception contained in the patents relied on by the defendant seem to exclude its pretensions; and that the refusal of a certain instruction, which was sound in law, did not prejudice the defendant.

3. The absence of a replication to a new answer cannot be made in this court, for the first time, a ground of objection to the subsequent proceedings.

Argued and submitted April 21, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado.

See 5 McCrary, 639. Affirmed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Field:

This is an action to recover certain mining ground, being part of what is known as the Adelaide Lode in Lake County, Colorado, lying within the California Mining District. It was originally brought in the name of Frederick S. Van Zandt, who claimed to be the owner of the lode. Subsequently he transferred his interest to a corporation, created under the laws of New York, known as the Terrible Mining Company; and by consent of parties that Company was [479] substituted as plaintiff in the action. To the original complaint an answer was filed by the defendant, the Argentine Mining Company, a corporation created under the laws of Missouri, to which a replication was made. To the complaint, amended by the substitution of the Terrible Mining Company as plaintiff, a new answer, substantially the same as the one to the original complaint, was filed, but it does not appear from the record that any replication was made to it. The parties seem to have considered the replication to the original answer as sufficient, for the trial was had without any reference to this omission. Its absence cannot be made in this court, for the first time, a ground of objection to the subsequent proceedings. Nor do we consider counsel of the plaintiff in error as making any point upon the omission, although he calls our attention to it.

The plaintiff below, defendant in error here, is the owner of the Adelaide mining claim. The defendant below, plaintiff in error, is the owner of three other mining claims, called, respectively, the "Camp Bird," the "Pine" and the "Charlestown" lode claims. All these claims lie in the same mining district. The Adelaide claim was located in 1876. The other claims were located in 1877. The Adelaide claim occupies on the surface longitudinally a northeast and southwest direction. The Pine, Camp Bird and Charlestown claims occupy a position nearly north and south, with end lines practically east and west, thus crossing diagonally the Adelaide claim. During the summer of 1880, the defendant below carried its mining operations through its own ground into the Adelaide claim, and it justifies its action in this respect by asserting that in doing so it followed a vein which has its outcrop, or apex, within the surface of its own locations. It cites section 2322, Revised Statutes, in support of its position. That section provides that locators of mining claims, previously or subsequently made, on any mineral vein, lode or ledge on the public domain, to which no adverse right existed on the 10th of May, 1872, "so long as they comply with the laws of the United States, and with state, territorial and local regulations not in conflict with the laws of the United States governing their possessory title, shall have the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all the surface included within the lines of their locations, and of all veins, lodes and ledges throughout their entire depth, the top or apex of which lies inside of such surface lines extended downward vertically, although such veins, lodes or ledges may so far [480] depart from a perpendicular in their course downward as to extend outside the vertical side lines of such surface locations. But their right of possession to such outside parts of such veins or ledges shall be confined to such portions thereof as lie between vertical planes drawn downward, as above described, through the end lines of their locations, so continued in their own direction that such planes will intersect such exterior parts of such veins or ledges."

And the defendant requested the court to instruct the jury as follows:

"The law provides that upon a location properly made the claimant shall have the vein upon which the location is made and and all other veins and lodes having their top or apex in the territory within the lines of the location, and not only within the body of the claim within the lines of the location, but beyond those lines as far as the vein or lode may, in its descent into the earth, pass beyond those lines and within the end lines of the location.

"The defendant here claims that the lode in controversy originates in its patented territory, by its top or apex, and descends upon its dip through and under the ground in controversy. If, from the preponderance of evidence, you believe that the top or apex of the lode in controversy does, in fact, originate within the patented territory of the defendant and descends upon its dip into the ground in controversy, your verdict should be for the defendant."

This instruction the court refused to give, and the defendant excepted.

The court instructed the jury substantially as follows: 1, that a statute of the State requires that the discoverer before filing a location certificate shall first locate his claim by sinking a discovery shaft upon the lode to a depth of at least ten feet from the lowest part of the rim of the shaft at the surface, or deeper if necessary, to show a well defined crevice; 2, shall post at the point of discovery on the surface a plain sign or notice containing the name of the [481] lode, the name of the location, and the date of the discovery; 3, shall mark the surface boundaries of the claim by six substantial posts; that to recover a mining claim the plaintiff must show a good location in compliance with this statute, and that means "that he shall show in his discovery shaft a vein or lode of valuable ore in rock in place;" that the miner is not bound to make the first shaft or opening which he may sink his discovery shaft; he can make anyone he may sink such shaft, only he must have in it a lode or vein. It is not sufficient for him to find minerals which would yield something, in a fragmentary condition, in the slide or loose tuff on the surface of the mountain, but he must find it within enclosing rocks in the general mass of the mountain; and that the question here is whether the parties who made the Adelaide location found such a lode or vein in what they denominated the discovery shaft or opening, and that this was a matter to be determined by the jury; and if they find that the locators made such a discovery, the next question was whether the vein extended to the point in dispute, and that the location was valid only to the extent of the lode included within it. The court added: "The question turns upon the validity of the Adelaide location. As I have explained it to you, if you believe it to be a valid location, well made, according to the law as given in the statute, you will find for the plaintiff. If you think it was not so made, you will find for the defendant." To this charge the counsel of the defendant excepted, pointing out the particulars to which he objected. Upon the argument before us, he adhered to his exception to the closing part of the charge, because it was not accompanied by the further instruction, "that if the jury believe from the evidence that the location of the Adelaide claim was made upon the dip of a vein or lode whose top or apex was then in and extended through the patented territory of the defendant, such location of the Adelaide claim would, to the extent that it was on the dip of said vein whose top or apex was so in the defendant's patented territory, be invalid."

The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff upon which judgment for the possession of the demanded premises was entered, and the defendant has brought the case to this court for review.

Messrs. Walter H. Smith, A. T. Britton and A. B. Browne, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. T. M. Patterson and C. S. Thomas, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

The instruction, as requested by the defendant, as a proposition of law is undoubtedly sound. It is substantially a brief repetition of the language of the statute. Its refusal, however, did not prejudice the defendant; for a valid location, as defined by the court, could only be found in favor of the plaintiff in case the vein discovered by the locators of the Adelaide claim extended to the ground in dispute. If such were the fact, the principle involved in the instruction asked, applied to that claim, cut off the right asserted by the defendant. If there was an apex or outcropping of the same vein within the surface of the boundaries of the claims of the defendant, that Company could not extend its workings under the Adelaide location, that being of earlier date. Assuming that on the same vein there were surface outcroppings within the boundaries of both claims, the one first located necessarily carried the right to work the vein.

But there are other grounds equally conclusive against the contention of the defendant below. The instruction asked assumes that the longest sides of its claims were their side lines. Such would, undoubtedly, be the case if the locations of the claim were along the course or strike of the lode. The statute undoubtedly contemplates that the location of a lode or vein claim shall be along the course of the lode or vein. Its language is: "A mining claim located after the 10th of May, 1872, whether located by one or more persons, may equal, but shall not exceed, one thousand five hundred feet in length along the vein or lode; but no location of a mining claim shall be made until the discovery of the vein or lode within the limits of the claim located. No claim shall extend more than three hundred feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface, nor shall any claim be limited by any mining regulation to less than twenty-five feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface, except where adverse rights existing on the 10th of May, 1872, render such limitation necessary. The end lines of each claim shall be parallel to each other." R. S. 2320.

When, therefore, a mining claim crosses the course of the lode or vein instead of being "along the vein or lode," the end lines are those which measure the width of the claim as it crosses the lode. Such is evidently the meaning of the statute. The side lines are those which measure the extent of the claim on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface Such is the purport of the decision in Mining Co. v. Tarbet, 98 U. S. 463 [25: 253]. The court there said, referring to the Statute of 1866, 14 Stat. at L. 251, and that of 1872, 17 Stat. at L. 91: "We think that the intent of both statutes is that mining locations on lodes or veins shall be made thereon, lengthwise, in the general direction of such veins or lodes on the surface of the earth where they are discoverable; and that the end lines are to cross the lode and extend perpendicularly downwards, and to be continued in their own direction either way horizontally; and that the right to follow the dip outside of the side lines is based on the hypothesis that the direction of these lines corresponds substantially with the course of the lode or vein at its apex on or near the surface. It was not the intent of the law to allow a person to make his location crosswise of the vein, so that the side lines shall cross it, and thereby give him the right to follow the strike of the vein outside of his side lines. That would subvert the whole system sought to be established by the law. If he does locate his claim in that way, his rights must be subordinated to the rights of those who have properly located on the lode." And again, that the end lines of the claim, properly so called, are "those which are crosswise of the general course of the vein on the surface."

Such being the law, the lines which separate the location of the plaintiff below from the locations of the defendant are end lines, across which, as they are extended downward vertically, the defendant cannot follow a vein, even if its apex or outcropping is within its surface boundaries, and, as a consequence, could not touch the premises in dispute, which are conceded to be outside of those lines and outside of vertical planes drawn downward through them.

The defendant relied on the trial upon patents of the United States issued for its several claims; but those patents contain an exception which would also seem to exclude its pretensions. It is as follows, after the habendum clause: "Excepting and excluding, however, all that portion of said surface ground embraced by mineral survey No. 254 of the Adelaide mining claim, and also excepting and excluding all veins, lodes, or deposits, the tops or apexes of which lie inside of the exterior lines of said Adelaide survey at the surface, extended down vertically, or which have been therein discovered or developed."

From a consideration of the whole case we are unable to perceive any error which would justify a reversal of the judgment below.

It is accordingly affirmed.

v.
CHARLES GRISWOLD ET AL., Children and Heirs at Law of JOHN GRISWOLD, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 441-450.)

Ejectment—Pennsylvania land titles—return of survey—lapse of more than 130 years, without return, conclusive against title—rules of 1765—review of authorities.

1. The fact that no survey has ever been returned to the land-office is a conclusive objection to the title to lands in Pennsylvania, based on a survey alleged to have been made more than 130 years ago.

2. The rule adopted by the land-office in 1765 made no alteration in the practice of requiring returns of surveys. The duty of having the surveys returned was always the same; and the manifest inconvenience of outstanding secret titles led the courts, in process of time, to adopt a rule that a survey would be regarded as abandoned unless returned in a reasonable time, which was finally fixed at seven years.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Samuel Hepburn, Jr., for plaintiffs in error:

If the title offered by the defendants below had been called in question before the Revolution, or in the early days of the Commonwealth, there can be no doubt it would have been approved and confirmed.

The learned judges of the circuit court applied the tests of the present time to a title perfected before the rules now in force were known.

At present a junior survey returned takes precedence of an elder one not returned.

Now it is the duty of a warrantee to see that the survey is duly returned; and the failure to make return is punished as his neglect.

In early times exactly the opposite of this was the law.

Messrs. Samuel Hepburn and James Ryon, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion [442] of the court:

This is an action of ejectment for 405 acres of land in Cumberland County, Pennsylvania, brought by the heirs at law of John Griswold, the defendants in error, against George W. Paxton and others, plaintiffs in error, to which the defendants below pleaded not guilty. The cause was tried at Philadelphia before Judge McKennan, and the jury, by direction of the court, found a verdict for the plaintiffs below, and judgment was entered accordingly. That judgment is now before us for review. The questions of law in the case arise upon a bill of exceptions taken at the trial, which shows the following proceedings. The plaintiffs, besides showing by certain depositions, that they were the heirs at law of John Griswold, adduced in evidence, 1, a warrant granted to him, dated May 23, 1848, for 400 acres of land, adjoining lands surveyed to other persons named, situate in the Townships of Dickinson and South Middleton, in the County of Cumberland, acknowledging payment for the same to the treasurer of the Commonwealth; 2, a survey made on said warrant, dated December 26, 1853, containing 405 acres 138 perches, returned into the land-office; 3, a patent to John Griswold for the said land, describing the same according to the plot of the survey; 4, the writ of ejectment issued in the cause, for the purpose of proving that the defendants were in possession of the land claimed in the writ.

The defendants then made the following offer: A. Warrant to Thomas Cookson, dated 26th August, 1751; B. Certificate of payment of purchase money by Cookson on 27th August, 1751. [443]

They also offered to prove that a survey was actually made immediately after the date of the warrant and 1264 acres located upon it.

That this location and survey was known to the proprietaries, and recognized and approved by their officers.

That a subsequent warrant was issued by the proprietaries, calling for this location in favor of Cookson.

That this land was assessed for taxes in 1765, in 1770, and subsequently.

That the same land was conveyed by different deeds and by various legal proceedings down to the year 1846, when it vested in Geisse and Kropff, who mortgaged it to the Farmers and Mechanics Bank of Philadelphia, to secure part of the purchase money.

That the land was sold on the mortgage on 13th November, 1849, purchased by the said bank, and by them conveyed to the defendants and those under whom they claim.

That Griswold, under whom plaintiffs claim, was a clerk in the employ of Geisse and Kropff, and made an application in 1848 for this land, and therein set out that it was for the use of Geisse and Kropff.

That Griswold left the State immediately after that date, 1848, and never returned, and the title by return of survey and by patent was completed by the defendants in the name of Griswold, because it was the custom of the land officer at that day to issue the patent in the name of the applicant, Griswold having died in 1860.

This offer was objected to by the plaintiffs, on the following grounds, to wit: that no survey was ever made upon it by any proof that is adduced before this court in any shape or form by any official; that the offer does not propose to show an official survey, or survey made by direction of the proprietaries; that any other survey is immaterial and irrelevant in this case; that finding lines of an old survey upon the ground does not prove that they are made by official authority, or that they were any more than trespasses upon the land of the proprietaries; that such a survey unreturned gives no right to a warranty under the proprietaries claiming land by virtue of a warrant issued under the proprietary system; that under the Act of 1784 no more than 400 acres could be surveyed upon one warrant, and that a survey made prior to the Act of 1779 was never returned into the land department. Conceding that they had the right to perfect their title under the Act of Assembly, they could not have surveyed or patented under that survey more than 400 acres.

Further, that the defendants cannot set up an equitable title in this action.

The court admitted A and B; the rest of the offer was rejected.

For the rejection of the rest of their offer, the defendants excepted.

The defendants then put in evidence (A) the warrant to Thomas Cookson, which was as follows:

A.

By the Proprietaries. Pennsylvania, ss:

Whereas, Thomas Cookson, of the County of Cumberland, hath requested that we would grant him to take up one hundred and fifty acres of land on a branch of Yellow Breeches, in the said County of Cumberland, for which he agrees to pay to our use at the rate of fifteen pounds ten shillings, current money of this Province, for one hundred acres, and the yearly quitrent of one half penny sterling for every acre thereof:

These are, therefore, to authorize and require you to survey, or caused to be surveyed, unto the said Thomas Cookson, at the place aforesaid, according to the method of townships appointed, the said quantity of 150 acres, if not already surveyed or appropriated, and make return thereof into the secretary's office in order for further confirmation, for which this shall be your sufficient warrant. Which survey, in case the said Thomas Cookson fulfill the above agreement within six months from the date hereof, shall be valid; otherwise void.

Given under my hand and the seal of the land-office, by virtue of certain powers from the said proprietaries, at Philadelphia, this twenty-sixth day of August, anno Domini one thousand seven hundred and fifty-one.

JAMES HAMILTON. [Seal.]

To Nicholas Scull, Surveyor-General.

The defendants also put in evidence (B) the following evidence of payment of purchase money by Cookson, to wit:

B.

This being all the evidence in the case, the court, as before stated, charged the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiffs for the land embraced in the warrant, survey, and patent given in evidence in their behalf; to which instruction the defendants excepted.

It will be perceived that the case turned upon the failure of the defendants to show that any official survey had ever been made under the vague and indescriptive warrant granted to Thomas Cookson, or that any survey had ever been returned to the land-office. Their offer did not propose proof of any such survey or return, and they contended, both at the trial and in this court, that no such proof was necessary under warrants granted prior to 1765, provided they could prove, by any means whatever, that an actual survey had been made by somebody, and that it was known to, and recognized by the proprietaries, in the manner stated in the offer.

It is admitted that no case precisely in point [446] can be found in the books; but it is argued by the counsel of the defendants that their title may be supported by the course of practice pursued by the proprietaries with regard to titles in the Province in the early part of last century.

We have examined with some diligence the Pennsylvania Reports, especially the cases cited by the counsel for the plaintiffs in error, to see if we could find any support for his position, and we have been unable to do so. We can find no case in which a private survey has been received as having any efficacy in making out a title, even though it may have been referred to in other surveys. All the cases have reference to official surveys. Parol and circumstantial evidence has been received to establish them, and no others.

The conclusive objection, however, to the title set up by the plaintiffs in error, is the fact that no survey has ever been returned to the land-office, though more than one hundred and thirty years have elapsed since the alleged survey was made. And, indeed, none could ever have been returned if the survey was a private one. This great lapse of time, without any return, and without occupation of the lands, is proof of abandonment. If taxes were paid on them, it was more than a hundred years ago. Passing of deeds from one hand to another, and even recording them, can have no effect on the question. It seems to us that the case is covered by the decision in Conkling v. Westbrook, 82 P. F. Smith, 81. In that case, the defendants set up title in part of the lands under a descriptive warrant to one Kellam, dated in 1798, but no survey made or returned until 1851, a lapse of fifty-eight years; and for another part they claimed under an indescriptive application of one Shaler, made in 1768, but no survey made or returned on it until 1851, a lapse of over eighty years. Evidence was offered by the defendants to show that Kellam had claimed to be owner of the lands for thirty years, and had exercised acts of ownership by cutting timber on them; that the lands were assessed to him on the assessment list from 1842, and he paid taxes thereon; that the lines of the Kellam tract had marks as far back as seventy [447] years, and those of the Shaler tract as far back as forty years; but there was no evidence to show who made the marks, or that a deputy surveyor ever made an official survey of either tract, until 1851. The court held that the defendants and those under whom they claimed having for so long a time neglected to have these surveys made and returned, and the plaintiff's title having in the meantime intervened, the law presumed an abandonment; and the court directed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania unanimously sustained this ruling.

It will be observed that the inception of one of these titles went back to 1768. The counsel for the plaintiffs in error contends, however, that a great change took place in the rules and practice of the land-office in 1765, and that the case of Conkling v. Westbrook does not rule the present case, because the title of his clients originated in 1751, before the establishment of the new rules, and not subject to them. But an examination of the rules adopted in 1765 shows that they related principally to the adoption of a new mode of procuring titles, by a simple application, without a warrant, and without payment until the survey was returned; but they made no alteration in the practice of requiring returns of surveys, though they established new sanctions for the enforcement thereof. It had always been the rule that surveys should be returned to the land-office, in order that it might appear by the records of that office what lands were alienated and what not. And although indulgence was exercised towards those who had procured their lands to be regularly surveyed and had paid for them, and they were held to have title from the time of such survey, and even from the time of their warrants when descriptive, so as to maintain ejectment thereon; yet, as against the proprietaries, and, after them, the State, the title was only an equitable one. The duty of having the surveys returned was always the same; and the manifest inconvenience of outstanding secret titles led the courts, in process of time, under the influence of certain statutes passed after the Revolutionary War, and the manifest dictates of public policy and convenience, to adopt [448] a rule that a survey would be regarded as abandoned unless returned in a reasonable time. This reasonable time was finally fixed at seven years. In Chambers v. Mifflin, 1 Penr. & W. 74, 78, where the warrant was dated in April, 1763, and therefore prior to the new rules of 1765, and where the survey was not returned until 1797, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania by Justice Huston said: "The doctrine of our courts has not been well understood, for when it is said a precisely descriptive warrant gives title from its date, a vague one from the time of survey, etc., it is sometimes added and always understood, provided it is otherwise followed up with reasonable attention. It is not, and never was, the law that on taking out a warrant, and procuring a survey, and then neglecting or refusing to pay the surveyor's fees, which was always necessary to procure a return, that a man could hold the land without attending to it in anyway for an indefinite length of time. Although a warrant has been surveyed, yet if not returned, the owner may change its lines, or change its place altogether and lay it on any other vacant land anywhere near; until it is returned, the State has no power to collect arrears of purchase money. It never can be that a man can wait thirty or forty years, and all that time be able to say, this is my land if I please, and not mine unless I please." The court adds: "We have full and ample provision on this subject by our Legislature. The Act of 9th April, 1781, for establishing a land-office, provides, in section 9, that all surveys heretofore made shall be returned into the Surveyor-General's office within nine months, and prescribes a penalty on any deputy surveyor to whom his fees shall be paid, who neglects to return. This continued till 5th April, 1782, when it was enacted, 'It shall be lawful for the Surveyor-General of this State to receive returns of such surveys, as shall appear to him to have been faithfully and regularly made, from the said late deputy surveyors, their heirs or legal representatives, for such further period as to him shall seem just and reasonable.'" After citing other Acts passed in 1785, relating to surveys under the Act of 1784, but showing the sense of the Legislature on the necessity of a return of survey in due time, and the evils incident on neglect in this particular, the judge proceeds:
[449] "Then came the Act of 4th September, 1793, which provides that 'All returns of surveys which have been actually executed since the 4th July, 1776, by deputy surveyors, while they acted under legal appointments, shall be received in the land-office, although the said deputy surveyors may happen not to be in office at the time of the return or returns being made; Provided, That no returns be admitted, that were made by deputy surveyors, who have been more than nine years out of office.' This short law is in some respects obscure when closely examined, but it further shows strongly the sense of the Legislature on the subject of keeping titles in this uncertain and unfinished state. It lays down a rule which is not easily gotten over by the courts. Independent of this law, who will say that the Act of 1782, which allows returns to be received until such period as the Surveyor-General shall deem just and reasonable, would keep the office open forever? I am aware that there are cases where plaintiffs have recovered on surveys not returned since 1793. They will, however, be found very special cases, where the owner has proved great exertions on his part to procure returns, and fraud or accident in preventing them. I am also aware that the owners of many tracts, who have taken possession and occupied them, or transmitted them to their descendants, have found no returns in the office. In such cases the land officers issue orders and have returns made yet, and rightly, for no injury is done to any one. So, if land has been surveyed, and no adverse claimant, as improver, or by warrant, has any claim to the land, returns are received, and may be received, from the present deputy surveyors; but where, as in the present case, a vague or removed warrant has been surveyed, and then neglected thirty years, or even a less time, and no excuse shown, it was not within a 'just and reasonable time' to receive the return, after another had bought and paid for it, as derelict." This case was decided in 1829.

The principles of this case were followed up in the subsequent cases of Addleman v. Masterson, 1 Penr. & W. 454; Starr v. Bradford, 2 Penr. & W. 398, and Strauch v. Shoemaker, 1 Watts & S. 166. In the last case a "just and reasonable time" for the return of a survey was [450] settled at seven years, as had been suggested in the previous case of Starr v. Bradford.

We think that these authorities reach the present case, notwithstanding the inception of title took place prior to the year 1765, and that the decision of the Circuit Court was right; and it is therefore affirmed.

[597] DENVER AND RIO GRANDE RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
JAMES HARRIS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 597-610.)

Railroads—taking forcible possession of a railroad—personal injuries—action for damages—compensatory and punitive damages—liability of corporation for torts committed by its servants.

1. A corporation is liable civiliter for torts committed by its servants or agents precisely as a natural person; and it is liable as a natural person for the acts of its agents done by its authority, express or implied, though there be neither a written appointment under seal, nor a vote of the corporation constituting the agency or authorizing the act.

2. A railroad company is liable for personal injuries resulting to the person or persons in the peaceable possession of property, from its employment of force and violence in disturbing such peaceable possession, without reference to the question of legal title or right of possession.

3. Where a corporation, by its controlling officers, has wantonly disturbed the peace of the community, and by the use of violent means has endangered the lives of citizens in order to maintain rights, for the vindication of which, if they existed, an appeal should have been made to the judicial tribunals, the doctrine of punitive damages applies in an action to recover for personal injuries to the plaintiff.

4. Where one of the consequences of a wound, caused by the defendant's wrong, is to render the plaintiff impotent, evidence thereof is admissible, although the declaration does not in terms so specify; and the jury may consider such impotency in estimating compensatory damages.

5. In the case presented, the evidence furnishes no basis for the suggestion that the plaintiff voluntarily joined an illegal assembly for the purpose, if necessary, of committing murder, or any other criminal offense.

Argued May 5, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the Territory of New Mexico. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Charles M. Da Costa, Clarence A. Seward, John M. Waldron and Edward O. Wolcott, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Jno. H. Knaebel, for defendant in error:

Corporate responsibility is the correlative of corporate power; and a corporation whose force and funds are employed unlawfully to effectuate some corporate design, however illegal, is responsible forensically in as high a degree as the humblest citizen.

Salt Lake City v. Hollister, 118 U. S. 256 (ante, 176); Baltimore & P. R. R. Co. v. Fifth Bap. Church, 108 U. S. 330 (27:744); Nat. Bank v Graham, 100 U. S. 702 (25:751); Merchants Bank v. State Bank, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 604 (19:1008); Phila. W. & B. R. R. Co. v. Quigley, 62 U. S. 21 How. 209 (16:75); Lynch v. Met. Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 77; Rameden v. Boston & A. R. R. Co. 104 Mass. 117; Frost v. Domestic Sewing M. Co. 138 Mass. 563; St. Louis, C. & A. R. R. Co. v. Dalby, 19 Ill. 353; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Peacock, 48 Ill. 253; Eastern Counties R. Co. v. Broom, 6 Exch. R. 314; Pa. R. R. Co. v. Vandiver, 42 Pa. 365; 2 Wood's Ry. Law, 1874.

The trespass being willful, wanton and cruel, and manifesting extraordinary turpitude, exemplary damages were proper.

Day v. Woodworth, 54 U. S. 13 How. 363 (14:181); Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489 (23:374); Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 521 (29:466).

The plaintiff in error has suffered no substantial prejudice from anything here alleged as error. The extremely serious injury suffered by the defendant in error, and the enormity of outrage attending its commission, suggest that the damages awarded are even less than justice might demand.

Decatur Bank v. St. Louis Bank, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 294 (22:560); Walbrun v. Babbitt, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 577 (21:489); Marine Bank v. Fulton Bank, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 252 (17:785); Union Con. S. Min. Co. v. Taylor, 100 U. S. 37 (25:541).

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by James Harris, [598] the defendant in error, against the Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company, a corporation of the State of Colorado, to recover damages for injuries which, he alleges, were sustained by him, in his person, by reason of an illegal and wrongful assault made by that Company, acting by its servants and agents. The plea was not guilty. There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $9,000. The judgment was affirmed in the Supreme Court of the Territory, and has been brought here for review.

The defendant introduced no evidence, although its officers were the chief actors on the occasion when the plaintiff was injured. The case made by the latter and other witnesses testifying in his behalf is stated by the Supreme Court of the Territory, in the following extract from its opinion:

"The record discloses the fact that there was evidence on the trial in the lower court to the effect that about the tenth or twelfth of June, 1879, the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Rail-[599] way Company was in peaceable possession, by its agents and employés, of a certain railroad in the State of Colorado, running from Alamosa to the City of Pueblo, in that State; that at or about that date, and while the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railway Company were so in possession of said railroad, the plaintiff in error, the Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company, by an armed force of several hundred men, acting as its agents and employés, and under its vice president and assistant general manager, attacked with deadly weapons the agents and employés of said Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railway Company having charge of said railroad, and forcibly drove them from the same, and took forcible possession thereof; that there was a demonstration of armed men all along the line of the railroad seized; and while this was being done, and the seizure was being made, the defendant in error, who was an employé of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railway Company, on said line of railroad, and while on the track of the road, and on a hand car thereon, in the line of his employment, was fired upon by men as he was passing, and seriously wounded and injured; that immediately upon the seizure of the railroad as aforesaid the plaintiff in error accepted it, and at once entered into possession thereof, and commenced and for a time continued to use and [605] operate the same as its own."

One of the propositions advanced by counsel for the Company is this: That it appears from the plaintiff's case, and by his evidence, that he voluntarily armed himself, and taking the law into his own hands, joined an illegal assembly for the purpose, if necessary, of committing murder; that, in the course of the riot and rout, he received a wound at the hands of those whom he had sought by violence to destroy; that, under such circumstances, the law will not permit him to recover for an alleged assault, but conclusively presumes his assent thereto; nor will the law permit him to recover through the medium and by the aid of an illegal transaction, to which he was a party, and which constitutes the foundation of his case.

The same proposition was stated in another form in argument: that the plaintiff engaged voluntarily, and not for his necessary self defense, in a physical combat with others, and cannot, upon principle, maintain a civil action to recover damages for injuries received in such combat at the hands of his adversary, unless the latter beat him excessively or unreasonably; this, upon the ground that, "Where two parties participate in the commission of a criminal act, and one party suffers damages thereby, he is not entitled to indemnity or contribution from the other party."

These propositions have no application in the present case. The evidence, taken together, furnishes no basis for the suggestion that the plaintiff voluntarily joined an illegal assembly for the purpose if necessary, of committing murder, or any other criminal offense. Nor does it justify the assertion that he voluntarily engaged in a physical combat with others. All that he did on the occasion of his being injured was by way of preparation to protect himself, and the property of which he and his co-employés were in peaceable possession, against organized violence. It appears in proof, as stated by the court below, that the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railroad Company was [606] in the actual, peaceable possession of the road when the other Company, by an armed body of men, organized and under the command of its chief officers, proceeded, in a violent manner, to drive the agents and servants of the former company from the posts to which they had been respectively assigned. It was a demonstration of force and violence, that disturbed the peace of the entire country along the line of the railway, and involved the safety and lives of many human beings. It is a plain case, on the proof, of a corporation taking the law into its own hands, and, by force and the commission of a breach of the peace, determining the question of the right to the possession of a public highway established primarily for the convenience of the people. The courts of the Territory were open for the redress of any wrongs that had been, or were being, committed against the defendant by the other company. If an appeal to the law, for the determination of the dispute as to right of possession, would have involved some delay, that was no reason for the employment of force—least of all, for the use of violent means under circumstances imperiling the peace of the community and the lives of citizens. To such delays all—whether individuals or corporations—must submit, whatever may be the temporary inconvenience resulting therefrom. We need scarcely suggest that this duty, in a peculiar sense, rests upon corporations which keep in their employment large bodies of men, whose support depends upon their ready obedience of the orders of their superior officers, and who, being organized for the accomplishment of illegal purposes, may endanger the public peace, as well as the personal safety and the property of others besides those immediately concerned in their movements.

These principles, under somewhat different circumstances, were recognized and enforced by this court at the present term. One Johnson was in the actual peaceable possession of eighteen miles of a railroad built by him for a railroad company, and was running his own locomotives over it. He claimed the right to hold possession until he was paid for his work. But the company, disputing his right to possession, ejected him by force and violence. He brought [607] his action of forcible entry and detainer. This court said that the party "so using force and acquiring possession may have the superior title, or may have the better right, to the present possession; but the policy of the law in this class of cases is to prevent the disturbances of the public peace, to forbid any person righting himself in a case of that kind by his own hand and violence, and to require that the party who has in this manner obtained possession shall restore it to the party from whom it has been so obtained; and then, when the parties are in status quo, or in the same position as they were before the use of violence, the party out of possession must resort to legal means to obtain his possession, as he should have done in the first instance." Iron Mountain & H. R. R. Co. v. Johnson, 119 U. S. 608 [ante, 504]. Wh" this language was used in a case arising unde.

a local statute, relating to actions of forcible entry and detainer, it is not without force in cases like this, where the peaceable possession of property is disturbed by such means as constitute a breach of the peace. If, in the employment of force and violence, personal injury arises therefrom to the person or persons thus in peaceable possession, the party using such unnecessary force and violence is liable in damages, without reference to the question of legal title or right of possession.

Reference was made in argument to those portions of the charge that refer to the liability of corporations for torts committed by their employés and servants.

In Philadelphia, W. & B. R. R. Co. v. Quigley, 62 U. S. 21 How. 207 [16:74], this court held that a railroad corporation was responsible for the publication by them of a libel, in which the capacity and skill of a mechanic and builder of depots, bridges, station houses, and other structures for railroad companies, were falsely and maliciously disparaged and undervalued. The publication, in that case, consisted in the preservation, in the permanent form of a book for distribution among the persons belonging to the corporation, of a report made by a committee of the company's board of directors, in relation to the administration and dealings of [608] the plaintiff as a superintendent of the road. The court, upon a full review of the authorities, held it to be the result of the cases, "that for acts done by the agents of a corporation, either in contractu or in delicto, in the course of its business, and of their employment, the corporation is responsible as an individual is responsible under similar circumstances." In State v. Morris & Essex R. R. Co. 23 N. J. L. 869, it was well said that, "If a corporation has itself no hands with which to strike, it may employ the hands of others; and it is now perfectly well settled, contrary to the ancient authorities, that a corporation is liable civiliter for all torts committed by its servants or agents by authority of the corporation, express or implied. * * * The result of the modern cases is that a corporation is liable civiliter for torts committed by its servants or agents precisely as a natural person; and that it is liable as a natural person for the acts of its agents done by its authority, express or implied, though there be neither a written appointment under seal nor a vote of the corporation constituting the agency or authorizing the act." See also Salt Lake City v. Hollister, 118 U. S. 256, 260 [ante, 176, 178]; New Jersey Steamboat Co. v. Brockett, present term, 121 U. S. 637 [ante, 1049]; National Bank v. Graham, 100 U. S. 699, 702 [25: 750, 751]. The instructions given to the jury were in harmony with these salutary principles. Whatever may be said of some expressions in the charge, when detached from their context, the whole charge was as favorable to the defendant as it was entitled to demand under the evidence.

One of the consequences of the wound received by the plaintiff at the hands of the defendant's servants was the loss of the power to have offspring—a loss resulting directly and proximately from the nature of the wound. Evidence of this fact was therefore admissible, although the declaration does not, in terms, specify such loss as one of the results of the wound. The court very properly instructed the jury that such impotency, if caused by the defendant's wrong, might be considered in estimating any compensatory damages to which the plaintiff might be found, under all the evidence, to be entitled. Wade v. Leroy, 61 U. S. 20 How. 44 [15:816].

The court also instructed the jury that they [609] were not limited to compensatory damages, but could give punitive or exemplary damages if it was found that the defendant acted with bad intent, and in pursuance of an unlawful purpose to forcibly take possession of the railway occupied by the other company, and in so doing shot the plaintiff, causing him incurable and permanent injury; always bearing in mind that the total damages could not exceed the sum claimed in the declaration. This instruction, the Company contends, was erroneous. Its counsel argue that while a master may be accountable to an injured party to the extent of compensatory damages for the wrongful acts of his servant—provided the servant is acting within the general scope of his employment in committing the injury—even though the master may not have authorized or may have even forbidden the doing of the particular act complained of, yet he cannot be mulcted in exemplary damages unless he directed the servant to commit the special wrong in question in such manner as to personally identify himself with the servant in the perpetration of the injurious act.

The right of the jury in some cases to award exemplary or punitive damages is no longer an open question in this court. In Day v. Woodworth, 54 U. S. 13 How. 371 [14:185], which was an action of trespass for tearing down and destroying a milldam, this court said that in all actions of trespass, and all actions on the case for torts "A jury may inflict what are called exemplary, punitive, or vindictive damages, upon a defendant, having in view the enormity of his offense rather than the measure of compensation to the plaintiff;" and that such exemplary damages were allowable "in actions of trespass where the injury has been wanton or malicious, or gross and outrageous." The general rule was recognized and enforced in Philadelphia, W. & B. R. R. Co. v. Quigley [supra], which, as we have seen, was an action to recover damages against a corporation for a libel; in the latter case, the court observing that the malice spoken of in the rule announced in Day v. Woodworth was not merely the doing of an unlawful or injurious act, but the act complained of must have been conceived "in the spirit of mischief or of criminal indifference to [610] civil obligations." See also Milwaukee & St. P. R. R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 492 [23:375]; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512, 521 [29: 463, 466]; and Barry v. Edmunds, 116 U. S. 550, 562-3 [29:729, 733].

The court, in the present case, said nothing to the jury that was inconsistent with the principle as settled in these cases. The jury were expressly restricted to compensatory damages, unless they found from the evidence that the defendant acted with bad intent and in pursuance of an unlawful purpose to employ force to dispossess the other company. The doctrine of punitive damages should certainly apply in a case like this, where a corporation, by its controlling officers, wantonly disturbed the peace of the community and by the use of violent means endangered the lives of citizens in order to maintain rights, for the vindication of which, if they existed, an appeal should have been made to the judicial tribunals of the country. That the defendant, within the meaning of the rule holding corporations responsible for the misconduct of their servants in the course of its business and of their employment, directed that to be done which was done, is not to be doubted from the evidence, the whole of which is given in the bill of exceptions. Its governing officers were in the actual command and directing the movements of what one of the witnesses described as the "Denver and Rio Grande forces," which were avowedly organized for the purpose of driving the other company and its employés, by force, from the possession of the road in question.

Other questions were discussed by counsel, but they do not, in our judgment, deserve consideration. Substantial justice has been done without violating any principle of law in the admission of evidence, or in the granting or refusing of instructions.

The judgment is affirmed.

[211] CHARLES BENZIGER ET AL., Plffs. in Err.,
v.
WILLIAM H. ROBERTSON, Collector of the PORT OF NEW YORK.

Duties—"Rosaries," subject to 50 per cent ad valorem, the duty imposed on beads.

"Rosaries," composed of beads with steel, silver and other metals, the beads being the component material of chief value, are dutiable at the rate of duty imposed on beads, under section 2499, R. S. which provides that "On all articles manufactured from two or more materials, the duty shall be assessed at the highest rates at which any of the component parts may be chargeable."

Argued and submitted May 2, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. R. D. Mussey, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen. for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law, commenced in a court of the State of New York, and removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, brought by the firm of Benziger Brothers against the Collector of the Port of New York, to recover back duties alleged to have been illegally exacted on importations made into the Port of New York, in 1881, of articles which were entered as "rosaries." The duty exacted was 50 per cent ad valorem, under schedule "M" of section 2504 of the Revised Statutes, 2d ed. p. 473, which provides for that rate of duty on [212] "all beads and bead ornaments." At the trial, the court directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiffs excepted to this direction and, after such a verdict and a judgment accordingly, brought this writ of error.

The component materials of the rosaries in question were: 1. Beads, glass; chain and cross, metal. 2. Beads, wood; chain and cross, metal. 3. Beads, chain, and cross all of steel. 4. Beads, bone; chain and cross, metal. 5. Beads, ivory; chain and cross, metal. 6. Beads, chain, and cross all of silver. 7. Beads, mother-of-pearl; chain and cross, metal. It was proved at the trial that the rosaries are composed of beads, a metal chain, and a cross, the beads being fastened on the chain at regular intervals; that a rosary is not complete without a cross; that they are used by Roman Catholics in counting their prayers; that they are carried in the pocket when not so in use, and are never used for ornament; that, in all cases, the beads are the component material of chief value; that they are dealt in only by dealers in religious and devotional articles pertaining to the Catholic Church, and are not dealt in by those who deal generally in beads and bead ornaments, and are not known to them; and that the expression "I say the beads," is sometimes applied to the devotional exercises which are performed on rosaries. The witnesses for the plaintiffs testified that the articles in question are known to importers and wholesale dealers as rosaries, and are dealt in under that name, and are not dealt in under the name of beads; that dealers in rosaries also deal in the beads not made up into rosaries, but fastened together on a cotton string, which they sell to parties to be made up into rosaries; that an order for beads would be understood to mean these beads and not the ones made up into rosaries; and that the people who use rosaries sometimes call them "beads" and sometimes "rosaries." The witness for the defendant testified that they are called beads or rosaries, and are bought and sold under the name of beads; that, in point of fact, they are made of beads, and are called beads and rosaries, irrespective of the material of which the beads are composed. On cross examination he testified as follows: "Q. What class of people call them beads? A. Well, I think people in New York. Q. What class of people in New York? [213] A. A great many Catholics call them beads, and a great many call them rosaries. Q. Don't the dealers call them rosaries, and so catalogue them? A. Yes, sir."

The plaintiffs claim that the rosaries were not dutiable under the head of "beads and bead ornaments," but were dutiable under various provisions of the Revised Statutes, at 35 per cent, as manufactures of wood, bone, ivory, and shells; at 40 per cent, as manufactures of glass and silver, and at 45 per cent as manufactures of steel.

The principle adopted by the Treasury Department in directing the Collector to assess a duty of 50 per cent on these rosaries was that, as they were not enumerated as "rosaries" in the Tariff Act, and were composed of beads with steel, silver and other metals, the beads being the component material of chief value, although they might not be "bead ornaments," they were dutiable at the rate of duty imposed on beads, by virtue of the provision of section 2499 of the Revised Statutes, which enacts that "on all articles manufactured from two or more materials, the duty shall be assessed at the highest rates at which any of its component parts may be chargeable." This provision does not apply to any enumerated articles, but applies only to nonenumerated articles. The articles in question were known to importers and dealers as "rosaries." As such, they were not an enumerated article, but were dutiable, under the above provision of section 2499, at the duty imposed on "beads."

The cases of Lottimer v. Lawrence, 1 Blatchf. 613, and Arthur v. Susefield, 96 U. S. 128 [24: 772], cited by the plaintiffs, have no application to the present case. In the former case, the article in question, thread lace, was enumerated in the tariff by that name. In the second case, the article was spectacles, made of glass and steel. A duty of 45 per cent was exacted on the spectacles, as being "manufactures of steel, or of which steel shall be a component part." It was held by this court that the article was dutiable at only 40 per cent under the head of "pebbles for spectacles and all manufactures of glass, or of which [214] glass shall be a component material." The ground of the decision was that, as there could be no spectacles without pebbles or glass, the duty of 40 per cent was imposed on the pebbles or glass as materials to aid the sight, the steel being incidental merely, and that, in fact, spectacles were designated under the description of "pebbles for spectacles."

Judgment affirmed.

UNION DEPOT AND RAILROAD COMPANY ET AL.

Practice—dismissal of appeal taken nearly four years after the decree was rendered.

This court dismisses, upon its own motion, an appeal taken nearly four years after the decree was rendered, there being no suggestion of disability to bring the appellant within the proviso of section 1008, R. S.

Submitted May 11, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado. Dismissed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. E. T. Wells, for appellant.

No counsel appeared for appellees.

This was a suit in equity begun by Richard E. Whitsitt, then in life, and James Meskew, to quiet their possession of certain lots in Denver, Colorado. A decree was entered October 6, 1880, dismissing the bill. From that decree the complainants took an appeal to this court, which was dismissed at October Term, 1880, because it did not appear that the value of the matter in dispute exceeded $5,000. Whitsitt v. R. R. Co. 103 U. S. 770 [26: 337]. On the 20th of July, 1881, Emma C. Whitsitt appeared in the circuit court, and, suggesting the death of Richard E. Whitsitt, asked to be made a party to the suit in his stead, as sole heir and devisee. An order to this effect was made, and she, on the 30th of August, 1881, filed in the circuit court an affidavit showing that the value of the matter in dispute did exceed $5,000. On the same day she took another appeal, which was docketed in this court September 24, 1881, and dismissed, under Rule 16, April 5, 1884, for want of prosecution. The mandate from this court under this appeal was filed in the circuit court September 9, 1884, and the next day, September 10, Mrs. Whitsitt presented to the District Judge for the District of Colorado another appeal bond in the suit, which he accepted; and he also signed a citation that was duly served on the same day. This last appeal was docketed in this court September 22, 1884. When the case was reached in its regular order on the docket at the present term, it was submitted by the appellant on printed brief, no one appearing for the appellee.

Section 1008 of the Revised Statutes provides that "No judgment, decree, or order of a circuit or district court, in any civil action, at law or in equity, shall be reviewed in the supreme court on writ of error or appeal, unless the writ of error is brought, or the appeal is taken, within two years after the entry of such judgment, decree, or order; Provided, That where a party entitled to prosecute a writ of error or take an appeal is an infant, insane person, or imprisoned, such writ of error may be prosecuted, or such appeal may be taken, within two years after the judgment, decree, or order, exclusive of the term of such disability."

This decree was rendered October 6, 1880. [365] and the present appeal was not taken until September 24, 1884, nearly four years afterwards. There is no suggestion of disability such as would bring the appellant within the proviso. The appeal should therefore be dismissed; Scarborough v. Pargoud, 108 U. S. 567 [27: 824]; and it is so ordered.

Removal of causes—separable controversy—discontinuance—cause, properly remanded.

Where a cause could only have been removed, because of an alleged separate cause of action against one of the defendants, the cause should be remanded upon the entry of a discontinuance as to him.

[No. 841.]

Submitted April 26, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Texas. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. T. N. Waul, for appellants:

The circuit court had jurisdiction at the time it was removed. The question of jurisdiction was considered, adjudged and determined by the circuit judge on the motion awarding a repleader and the overruling of two motions to remand. Being established, no act of the complainant thereafter, either by discontinuing as to one of the parties defendant, or either of the causes of action, would authorize the court to remand, although the court should dismiss the case at the cost of complainants.

Phelps v. Oaks, 117 U. S. 236 (29: 888); Clarke v. Mathewson, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 164 (9: 1041); Roberts v. Nelson, 8 Blatchf. 74; Carrington v. R. R. Co. 9 Blatchf. 467.

Messrs. William E. Earle and W. W. Boyce, for appellee:

In this case the circuit court expressly holds in its order remanding the cause that, except as against the noncitizen Huntington, the entire controversy otherwise set up in said petition is wholly within the exclusive jurisdiction of the state court. When, therefore, this ligament was cut by the dismissal of the bill as to Huntington, the cause was necessarily remanded to the state court.

Hyde v. Ruble, 104 U. S. 407 (26: 828), Barney v. Latham, 103 U. S. 205 (26: 514).

It cannot be pretended there was any ground for hearing the case in the circuit court after the bill was dismissed as to Huntington; because no one else petitioned for removal, and because there was no separable controversy. The record discloses none, even whilst Huntington was a party, notwithstanding his petition; and none of the parties have suggested that there was after he was eliminated.

Case of Sewing M. Co. 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 553 (21: 914); Blake v. McKim, 103 U. S. 336 (26: 563).

This is an appeal under section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. 470, from an order of the circuit court remanding a suit which had been removed from a state court. The suit was begun December 18, 1883, in the Circuit Court of Harris County, Texas, by Henry Seeligson, a citizen of that State, and [521] the owner of twenty shares of the capital stock of the Texas Transportation Company, a Texas corporation, against that Company, and A. C. Hutchinson, Charles Fowler, E. W. Cave, and L. Megget, its directors and principal officers, for an account of the affairs of the Company; and to annul and set aside a note of the Company for $335,000 to Charles Morgan, together with a deed of trust given for its security. Hutchinson is a citizen of Louisiana, but all the rest of the defendants are citizens of Texas. On the 9th of February, 1884, a supplemental petition was filed in the suit, alleging that C. P. Huntington had become the owner of the note given to Morgan, and bringing him in as a defendant. Citation was served on him March 18, 1884, and on the 31st of the same month, he, being a citizen of New York, presented his petition for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Texas, on the ground "that there is a controversy in said suit which is wholly between citizens of different States, and which can be fully determined as between them; to wit, a controversy between said Seeligson, plaintiff, and your petitioner, and a controversy between your petitioner on one side, and in which the interests of the said Seeligson, the Texas Transportation Company, and the other defendants, officers of said Company, are on the other side." Upon this petition an order of removal was made, and the suit entered in the circuit court on the 16th of October, 1884, when the defendants appeared, and, on the first of December, filed a joint and several demurrer to the bill. On the 5th of January, 1885, this demurrer was sustained as to Huntington, but overruled as to the rest of the defendants. The bill was then amended, and afterwards, on the 9th of March, it was ordered that the "complainant do recast and amend his bill so as to conform to the equity rules of the supreme court, and that in so amending and recasting his pleadings, he have leave to bring in two or more bills, as counsel may advise, so as to save to complainant all the causes of action contained in his original bill," and that, "if this order is not complied with by the rule day in May next, the complainant's bill shall stand dismissed with costs." On the second of May, Seeligson made a motion to remand the suit, and this being overruled, on the [522] 4th of May he filed an amended bill, to which the defendants demurred June 1. This demurrer was set down for argument on the first Monday in November. Other motions were filed by the defendants, but, before any of them were disposed of, Seeligson, on the 19th of November, dismissed the suit as to Huntington, and at once moved to remand. This motion was granted January 9, 1886, and from that order this appeal was taken.

As the suit could only have been removed because of the alleged separate cause of action against Huntington, it was right to remand it as soon as the discontinuance was entered as to him. The express provision of section 5 of the Act of 1875 is, that if "it shall appear to the satisfaction of said circuit court at any time after such suit has been * * * removed thereto, that such suit does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of said circuit court, * * * the said circuit court shall proceed no further therein, but shall dismiss the suit or remand it to the court from which it was removed, as justice may require." The court was not required to keep the suit after the discontinuance, simply because it might have been removed when Huntington was a party. As soon as he was out of the case it did appear that "the suit did not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within" its jurisdiction.

The order to remand is affirmed.

COUNTY COURT OF KNOX COUNTY, AND THE JUSTICES Thereof.

(See S. C. "Harshman v. Knox County," Reporter's ed. 306-320.)

Municipal bonds—mandamus to compel levy of special tax to pay judgment—estoppel by judgment—extends to all facts involved—default.

Upon an application for a mandamus to compel the levy of a special tax to pay a judgment recovered upon municipal bonds, it is held:

1. That the respondents are estopped by the judgment to deny that the bonds were issued in pursuance of section 17 chapter 63, of the General Statutes of Missouri of 1866;
2. That the averment to that effect, being material and traversable, was confessed by default;
3. That it was part of the plaintiff's case to show, not merely the execution of the bonds, but their issue in pursuance of a law making them the valid obligations of the County;
4. That the estoppel is not confined to the judgment, but extends to all facts involved therein;
5. That the judgment is none the less conclusive because rendered by default;
6. That the bar is all the more perfect and complete in this proceeding because it is not a new action, but a remedy in the nature of an execution;
7. That the mandamus can be limited in its mandate only by that which the judgment itself declares;
8. That the original contract cannot be shown to determine the extent of the remedy provided by law for its enforcement, the matter having been adjudged in the original action;
9. That the judgment determined that the bonds sued on were issued under the authority of a statute which prescribed no limit to the rate of taxation for their payment; and
10. That the findings of the judgment on that point are conclusive and bind the respondents in their official capacity, as well as the County itself.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. Reported below, 5 McCrary, 76. Opinion below, 15 Fed. Rep. 705. Reversed, Remanded.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. T. K. Skinker and J. B. Henderson, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. George D. Reynolds and James Carr, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding by mandamus against the Justices of the County Court of Knox County to compel them to levy a tax sufficient to pay a judgment for $77,374.46, obtained by the relator, Harshman, on the 28th of March, 1881, against that County, in the Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Missouri.

The information alleges that "said judgment was recovered upon bonds and coupons issued by the said County in part payment of a subscription made by the said County on the 9th day of June, 1867, to the capital stock of the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company, a railroad company duly organized under the laws of the State of Missouri; that said subscription was authorized by a vote of the people of said County at a special election held pursuant to an order of the County Court of said County, on the 12th day of March, 1867, under the 17th section of chapter 63 of the General Statutes of Missouri of 1866, then in force; that at said election two thirds of the qualified voters of said County voted in favor of and assented to the making of said subscription; that relator has requested the said County Court and the Justices thereof to levy a special tax upon all the property in said County made taxable by law for county purposes, and upon the actual capital that all merchants and grocers and other business men may have invested in business in said County, and to cause the said tax to be collected in money, and when collected to be applied in payment and discharge of said judgment; that the said County Court and the Justices thereof have refused and neglected to levy the said tax; that the said County has no property out of which the said judgment can be levied, and that relator has no other adequate remedy at law." [307]

The respondents made return to the alternative writ substantially as follows: they admit that the judgment of the relator was recovered upon bonds and coupons issued by the County of Knox in part payment of two subscriptions made by said County to the capital stock of the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company; but they deny that said subscriptions or either of them were authorized by a vote of the people of that County at either a general or special election held pursuant to an order of the County Court of said County on the 12th day of March, 1867, or at any other time, under the 17th section of chapter 63 of the General Statutes of Missouri, then in force. They deny that two thirds of the qualified voters of Knox County ever voted in favor of or assented to making any subscription to the capital stock of the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company. They aver that, in point of fact, on the 18th of May, 1867, the County Court of said County made a subscription to the capital stock of said company in the sum of $100,000, and on the 2d of May, 1870, the said Court made a further subscription to the capital stock of said company in the sum of $55,000. That in payment of both of these subscriptions, the said Court issued bonds in the denominations of $500 and $50; that fifty-eight of the relator's said bonds are of the first of these issues, and sixty are of the second; that both of these subscriptions were made without the assent of two thirds of the qualified voters of the County, and, indeed, without any vote being taken at all, and against the will of said qualified voters; that they were made by authority only of section 13 of the charter of the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company, being an Act of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, entitled "An Act to Incorporate the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company," approved February 20, 1865; that each of relator's said bonds contains a recital that it is issued under and pursuant to orders of the County Court of Knox County to the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company, for subscription to the capital stock of said company, as authorized by said Act, to incorporate the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company approved February 20, 1865; and that said court has each year since the issue of said bonds levied a [308] tax of one twentieth of one per cent upon the assessed value of all the taxable property in said County, and has caused the same to be extended on the tax books of said County for each year, and has had said tax collected for the purpose of paying said bonds and coupons; that Knox County has no money in its treasury with which to pay the relator's judgment, and that the Judges of Knox County have no legal authority to levy any other or greater taxes than the taxes as hereinbefore stated, and no legal authority or power to levy or cause to be collected the special tax which the relator seeks to have imposed.

On the coming in of this return the relator moved the court to quash the same, on the ground that the matters and things therein set forth were inconsistent with and contradictory to the record of the judgment in the case. This motion was overruled by the court, to which ruling an exception was taken.

An answer to the return was filed by the relator, in which were set forth the various steps and proceedings taken, as therein alleged, by the authorities and people of the County of Knox, in respect to the issue of the bonds on which the judgment was founded, claiming that an election was duly had by an order of the [309] County Court under the authority of the general laws of Missouri, in virtue of which the subscription to the stock of the railroad company was made and the bonds in question issued. To this answer a replication was filed, and the case was submitted to a jury.

On the trial, as appears by a bill of exceptions duly taken, the relator offered to read in evidence the petition, summons, marshal's return, and judgment referred to in the information. On objection made by the respondents, the court ruled that these papers could not be read unless the relator would also read the bonds filed with said petition, to which ruling the relator excepted. The relator then put in evidence the said papers and also the said bonds.

The petition in the original action sets out "That on the 9th day of June, 1867, defendant subscribed to the capital stock of the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company, a railroad company duly organized under the laws of this State, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars; that said subscription was authorized by a vote of the people of said County of Knox at a special election held pursuant to an order of the County Court of said County on the 12th day of March, 1867, under the 17th section of chapter 63 of the General Statutes of Missouri of 1866, then in force; that at said election two thirds of the qualified voters of said County voted in favor of and assented to the making of said subscription; that in part payment of said subscription defendant, by its County Court, executed and issued divers bonds with coupons for interest attached; that by each of said bonds defendants promised to pay to bearer, at the National Bank of Commerce, in the City of New York, on the first day of February, 1878, the sum of five hundred dollars, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum; that said coupons for interest were made and are payable on the first day of February of each year between the issuing of said bonds and the maturity thereof; that by each of said coupons defendant promised to pay bearer the sum of thirty-five dollars, being one year's interest on the bond to which it was attached. That, in further payment in part of said subscription, defendant executed and issued divers other [310] bonds with coupons for interest attached; that by each of said bonds defendant promised to pay to bearer, at the National Bank of Commerce, in the City of New York, on the first day of February, 1880, the sum of five hundred dollars, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum; that said coupons for interest were made payable on the first day of February of each year, between the issuing of said bonds and the maturity thereof; that by each of said coupons defendant promised to pay to bearer the sum of thirty-five dollars, being one year's interest on the bond to which it was attached."

The petition also sets out that the plaintiff is the bearer and owner of divers of said bonds and coupons, designated by numbers. The return of the summons shows that the writ was duly served, and judgment was rendered thereon March 28, 1881, by default, which sets forth that "This action being founded upon certain bonds and coupons for interest thereon, issued by said defendant, and described in the petition, the court finds that the plaintiff has sustained damages by reason of the nonpayment thereof in the sum of $77,374.46. It is, therefore, considered by the court that the plaintiff, George W. Harshman, have and recover of the defendant, the County of Knox, as well the said sum of $77,374.46, the damages aforesaid by the court assessed, as also the costs herein expended, and have thereof execution."

Each of the bonds contains the following recital: "This bond being issued under and pursuant to order of the County Court of Knox County for subscription to the stock of the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company, as authorized by an Act of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, entitled 'An Act to Incorporate the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company,' approved February 20, 1865."

The issues of fact submitted to the jury were as follows:

"First. Was there an election held under the orders of the County Court read in evidence, and did two thirds of the qualified voters voting at said election cast their votes in favor of the subscription by the County Court to the stock mentioned in said orders?

"Second. Was the subscription to stock of the railroad company actually made, not, as [311] recited in said bonds, under the charter of the M. & M. R. R. Co., but under the general law, whereby the authority to make such subscription and issue bonds therefor was dependent on the vote of the people? In other words, has the relator proved that, despite the recitals in the bonds, they were not issued as recited, but under the general law, and that said recitals in the bonds were made through mistake or inadvertence?"

At the conclusion of the evidence the court instructed the jury "That to overcome the recitals in the bonds issued by the County Court under its seal, the evidence must be clear and positive, full and explicit, and that the burthen of proving the alleged mistake, so as to overthrow the said recitals, is upon the relator in this case," and "that the evidence to overcome said recitals is insufficient."

In answer to these questions, the jury found in the affirmative on the first, and in the negative on the second; and thereupon the court entered a judgment in favor of the respondents, in which it is recited that it appeared to the court "That there was an election held under orders of the County Court of Knox County, and that two thirds of the qualified voters voting at said election cast their votes in favor of the subscription by the said Court to the stock mentioned in its orders, but that the subscription to the stock of the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company was actually made and the bonds issued, not as alleged in the petition and alternative writ in this case, under the general law of the State of Missouri, but solely under and by virtue of an Act of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, entitled 'An Act to Incorporate the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company,' approved February 20, 1865."

The charter of the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company, referred to, incorporates it with power to construct a railroad from the Town of Macon, in the County of Macon, in the State of Missouri, through the Town of Edina, in the County of Knox, in said State, and thence to or near the northeast corner of said State, in the direction of Keokuk, in Iowa, or Alexandria, Missouri. The 18th section is as follows:

[312] "Sec. 18. It shall be lawful for the corporate authorities of any city or town, the county court of any county desiring so to do, to subscribe to the capital stock of said company; and may issue bonds therefor, and levy a tax to pay the same, not to exceed one twentieth of one per cent upon the assessed value of taxable property for each year."

On the other hand, sections 17 and 18 of the General Railroad Law, Gen. Stat. Mo. 1865, page 888, provide as follows:

"Sec. 17. It shall be lawful for the county court of any county, the city council of any city, or the trustees of any incorporated town, to take stock for such county, city or town in, or loan the credit thereof to, any railroad company, duly organized under this or any other law of the State; Provided That two thirds of the qualified voters of such county, city or town, at a regular or special meeting to be held therein, shall assent to such subscription."

"Sec. 18. Upon the making of such subscription by any county court, city or town, as provided for in the previous section, such county, city or town shall thereupon become, like other subscribers to such stock, entitled to the privileges granted and subject to the liabilities imposed by this chapter, or by the charter of the company in which such subscriptions shall be made; and in order to raise funds to pay the installments which may be called for from time to time by the board of directors of such railroad, it shall be the duty of the county court, or city council, or trustees of such town, making such subscription, to issue their bonds or levy a special tax upon all property made taxable by law for county purposes, and upon the actual capital that all merchants and grocers and other business men may have invested in business in the county, city or town, to pay such installments, to be kept apart from other funds, and appropriated to no other purpose than the payment of such subscription."

[316] It is not denied, and has been so decided by the Supreme Court of Missouri, that, under section 17 of the General Railroad Law, just cited, the county court of a county was authorized to subscribe to the stock of railroad companies, though created by special charter, provided the requisite assent of the qualified voters was duly obtained. Cape Girardeau, etc. Co. v. Dennis, 67 Mo. 438; Chouteau v. Allen, 70 Mo. 290.

It is also not denied that, by virtue of section 18 of the General Railroad Law, the special tax therein provided may be levied for the purpose of paying bonds issued in pursuance thereof, and that without limit as to its amount. U. S. v. County of Macon, 99 U. S. 582 [25: 331]. As the limit of taxation prescribed and permitted under section 18 of the Act incorporating the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company, to be levied in payment of bonds issued thereunder, was not to exceed one twentieth of one per cent upon the assessed value of the taxable property for each year, the contention of the respondents in the circuit court was that they were entitled to show by the recitals in the bonds themselves, in contradiction to those contained in the judgment founded upon them, that they were in fact issued under the charter of the corporation, and not under the general law. On this point the judgment of the circuit court was in their favor, denying to the relator the peremptory writ of mandamus, and this decision is now alleged as error, for which the judgment should be reversed.

The question is whether the respondents below are estopped in this proceeding by the judgment in favor of the relator against the County of Knox on the bonds, to deny that the bonds were issued in pursuance of section 17, chapter 63, of the General Statutes of Missouri of 1866. The averment to that effect in the petition in [317] the action, if material and traversable, was confessed by the default. The judgment recites that the action is founded upon certain bonds and coupons for interest thereon issued by said defendant and described in the petition. The averment as to the character of the bonds, and the grounds and authority upon which they were founded, so as to constitute them legal obligations of the County of Knox, contained in the petition, was clearly material to the plaintiff's cause of action. If the defendant had denied it by a proper pleading, the fact would have been put in issue, and the plaintiff would have been bound to prove it.

It was part of the plaintiff's case to show, not merely the execution of the bonds by the county authorities, but that they were issued in pursuance of a law making them the valid obligations of the county. The power to issue such securities does not inhere in a municipal corporation, so as to be implied from its corporate existence; it must be conferred, either in express words or by reasonable intendment; and if the authority to issue them in a given case is challenged by a proper denial, the plaintiff is put to the proof. What it is necessary for him to prove, it is proper for him to allege, and the allegation must be proven as made. It follows, therefore, that if a denial had been made in the action on the bonds in question, the averment that they were issued under section 17, chapter 63, of the General Statutes of Missouri of 1866, would have been material and traversable; and proof of the fact would have been necessary to support the recovery. In the absence of a denial, the fact as stated in the petition of the plaintiff is confessed by the default, and stands as an admission on the record, of its truth by the defendant. It is quite true that the judgment would have been the same whether the authority to issue the bonds was derived under the general statutes or under the charter of the railroad company, but good pleading required that the fact, whichever way it was, should be stated, and when stated the averment must be proved as laid.

As this is a direct proceeding upon the judgment, its effect as an estoppel is determined by the first branch of the rule as laid down in Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U. S. 351 [24: 195]. That is: "It is a finality as to the claim or demand in controversy, concluding parties and those in privity with them, not only as to every matter which was offered and received to sustain or defeat the claim or demand, but as to any other admissible matter which might have been offered for that purpose." And as stated in Burlen v. Shannon, 99 Mass. 200, 203: "The estoppel is not confined to the judgment, but extends to all facts involved in it, as necessary steps or the groundwork upon which it must have been founded." It is none the less conclusive because rendered by default. "The conclusiveness of a judgment upon the rights of the parties does in no wise depend upon its form or upon the fact that the court investigated or decided the legal principles involved; a judgment by default or upon confession is in its nature just as conclusive upon the rights of the parties before the court as a judgment upon a demurrer or verdict." Gifford v. Thorn, 9 N. J. Eq. 722. The bar is all the more perfect and complete in this proceeding because it is not a new action. Mandamus, as it has been repeatedly decided by this court, in such cases as the present, is a remedy in the nature of an execution for the purpose of collecting the judgment. Riggs v. Johnson County, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 166 [18: 768]; Supervisors v. Durant, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 417 [19: 733]; Thompson v. U. S. 103 U. S. 484 [26: 523]. Certainly nothing that contradicts the record of the judgment can be alleged in a proceeding at law for its collection by execution.

In Ralls County Ct. v. United States, 105 U. S. 733 [26: 1220], the Chief Justice said: "In the return to the alternative writ many defenses were set up which related to the validity of the coupons on which the judgment had been obtained as obligations of the county. As to these defenses, it is sufficient to say it was conclusively settled by the judgment, which lies at the foundation of the present suit, that the coupons were binding obligations of the county, duly created under the authority of the charter of the railroad company, and as such entitled to payment out of any fund that could lawfully be raised for that purpose. It has been in effect so decided by the Supreme Court of Missouri in State v. Rainey, 74 Mo. 229, and the principle on which the decision rests is elementary."

As the execution follows the nature of the judgment, and its precept is to carry into effect the rights of the plaintiff as declared by the judgment, with that mode and measure of redress which in such cases the law gives, so the mandamus in a case like the present can be limited in its mandate only by that which the judgment itself declares.

It was said, however, in Ralls County Ct. v. United States [supra], that "While the coupons are merged in the judgment, they carry with them into the judgment all the remedies which in law formed a part of their contract obligations, and these remedies may still be enforced in all proper ways, notwithstanding the change in the form of the debt." It is argued from this that, as the remedies to be resorted to for the purpose of enforcing the judgment are those given by the original contract, it is necessary to ascertain from the contract itself what those remedies are; but that is the very matter which has been already passed upon in the judgment which decides, in the present case, by its recital, the character and extent of the obligation created by the law of the contract. It may well be that in a case where the record of the judgment is silent on the point, the original contract may be shown, notwithstanding the merger, to determine the extent of the remedy provided by the law for its enforcement; but that is not admissible where, as in this case, the matter has been adjudged in the original action. Indeed, in view of the nature of the remedy by mandamus, as the means of executing the judgment, it is all the more material and important that the judgment itself should determine the nature of the contract and the extent of its obligation. The averment in the original petition that the bonds were issued under the authority of a particular statute becomes, therefore, an additional element in the plaintiff's case in that action for the purpose of showing with certainty what is the mode and measure of redress after judgment. By the terms of the judgment in favor of the relator it was determined that the bonds sued on were issued under the authority of a statute which prescribed no limit to the rate of taxation for their payment. In such cases, the law which authorizes the issue of the bonds gives also the means of payment by taxation. The findings in the judgment on that point are conclusive. They bind the respondents in their official capacity, as well as the County itself, because, as was said in Labette Co. Comrs. v. Moulton, 112 U. S. 217 [28: 698], "They are the legal representatives of the defendant in that judgment, as being the parties on whom the law has cast the duty of providing for its satisfaction." They are not strangers to it as being new parties on whom an original obligation is sought to be charged, but are bound by it as it stands without the right to question it, and under a legal duty to take those steps which the law has prescribed as the only mode of providing means for its payment."

[320]

The return of the respondents, therefore, to the alternative writ of mandamus is insufficient in law; and the circuit court erred in not awarding to the relator a peremptory writ of man- damus. For that error the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to award a peremptory mandamus.

[231] ALEXANDER R. SHEPHERD, Plff. in Err.,

v.

JOHN W. THOMPSON.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 231-241.)

Statute of Limitations—new promise—consideration—express or implied promise—construction of instrument—reversal—refusal to enter judgment on verdict at former trial.

1. The Statute of Limitations is to be upheld and enforced, not as resting only on a presumption of payment from lapse of time, but, according to its intent and object, as a statute of repose.

2. The original debt is a sufficient legal consideration for a subsequent promise to pay it, made either before or after the bar of the statute is complete.

3. In order to continue or to revive the cause of action, after it would otherwise have been barred by the statute, there must be either an express promise of the debtor to pay the debt or else an express acknowledgment of the debt from which his promise to pay it might be inferred. A mere acknowledgment, though in writing, of the debt as having once existed, is not sufficient to raise an implication of such a new promise. To have this effect there must be a distinct and unequivocal acknowledgment of the debt as still subsisting as a personal obligation of the debtor.

4. In the case presented, it is held: that an instrument which contains no promise of the defendant personally to pay the debt, and no acknowledgment or mention of it as an existing liability, but merely provides for the application of certain pledged property to its payment, does not amount to a new promise, express or implied.

5. Upon the reversal of a judgment of the court below this court cannot direct the entry of judgment upon a former verdict. When the second trial was ordered the case stood as if it had never been tried before; and this court can only review the rulings at the second trial.

Argued Apr. 25, 26, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

[232] IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Reversed, Remanded.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was an action brought March 11, 1880, by John W. Thompson against Alexander R. Shepherd, upon two promissory notes, dated March 10, 1873, made by the defendant and payable to the plaintiff, the one for $7,000 in two years, and the other for $8,000 in three years, with interest at the yearly rate of 8 per cent. The defendant pleaded the Statute of Limitations.

The record transmitted to this court showed that the case was tried twice, and that at each trial the plaintiff put in the following evidence: 1, The notes sued on. 2, A deed of trust of the same date, in the usual form of mortgages of real estate in the District of Columbia, and recorded in the land records for the District, liber 712, folio 128, by which the defendant conveyed to the plaintiff certain land described, in trust to secure the payment of these and one other note. 3, A deed, dated November 15, 1876, by which the defendant conveyed his property and choses in action, including a claim against the United States for the use and occupation of the premises No. 915 E Street Northwest in the City of Washington, to George Taylor and others, in trust to apply for the benefit of his creditors. 4, An instrument signed by the defendant and A. C. Bradley, assented to in writing by Taylor and his cotrustees, the body of which was as follows:

"In consideration of the indebtedness described in the deed of trust to William Thompson, trustee, executed March 10, 1873, and recorded in liber No. 712, folio 128, of the land records of the District of Columbia, the demand and claim of A. C. Bradley to the use of A. R. Shepherd and others against the United States for the use and occupation of the premises No 915 E Street Northwest, and all the proceeds thereof and the moneys derived therefrom, are [233] hereby pledged and made applicable to the payment of said indebtedness, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent per annum until paid; and it is hereby covenanted and agreed that any draft or check issued in payment or part payment of said claim shall be indorsed and delivered to the trustee named in said trust, and the proceeds thereof, less all proper costs and charges, be applied to the payment of said indebtedness, with interest as aforesaid, or to so much thereof as the sum or sums of money so received is or are sufficient to pay. Witness our hands this 21st day of June, 1877."

At the first trial, the judge ruled that this instrument was insufficient to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations, and a verdict and judgment were rendered for the defendant, which, upon a bill of exceptions of the plaintiff, were set aside at the General Term. 1 Mackey, 385.

At the second trial, the judge, against the objection and exception of the defendant, instructed the jury that this instrument was evidence of a new promise, which took the notes sued on out of the Statute of Limitations. A verdict and judgment were rendered for the plaintiff, and a bill of exceptions to this instruction was tendered and allowed. This judgment was affirmed in General Term, and the defendant sued out this writ of error.

Messrs. A. C. Bradley and Wm. F. Mattingly, for plaintiff in error:

The extrinsic evidence tended to rebut and repel any implication of a new promise. The very notes secured by the deed of trust were payable solely out of the property and created no personal liability.

Wood, Lim. Ac. 168, § 93, and p. 217; Morrill v. Frith, 3 Mees. & W. 402; Wetzel v. Bussard, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 309 (6:481); Barreda v. Silsbee, 62 U. S. 21 How. 168 (16:93); West v. Smith, 101 U. S. 270 (25:812); White v. Jordan, 27 Me. 370; Wainman v. Kynman, 1 Exch. 118.

The assignment is remarkable in not naming the plaintiff, in not assigning directly to him, in providing that the proceeds of the claim shall go to the trustee named in the deed of trust, and be by him applied, thereby indicating with sufficient force to justify, if not compel, the inference that the proposition had reference, not to the personal liability of the defendant, but solely to the liability of the property under the deed of trust.

Messrs. M. P. Morris and H. H. Wells, for defendant in error:

The assignment distinctly acknowledges and recognizes the indebtedness by reference to another paper, in which that indebtedness is specifically described, and which is in evidence in the case. It distinctly promises to pay that indebtedness; and it distinctly gives security for the payment of it. If this paper is not evidence of a new promise, it is impossible to draw a paper that would be.

Mr. Justice Gray, after stating the case as above reported, delivered the opinion of the court:

[234] The Statute of Limitations in force in the District of Columbia is the Statute of Maryland, which, so far as applicable to this case, closely follows the language of the English Statute, 21 Jac. I, chap. 16, § 3, but bars an action on a promissory note or other simple contract in three years after the cause of action accrues. Maryland Stat. 1715, chap. 23, § 2, 1 Kilty, Laws; Dist. Col. Laws, 1868, p. 284.

The promissory notes sued on were payable respectively on March 10, 1875, and March 10, 1876; and the action was brought March 11, 1880. The question is therefore whether the instrument signed by the defendant on June 21, 1877, is evidence of a sufficient acknowledgment or promise to take the case out of the statute.

The principles of law by which this case is to be governed are clearly settled by a series of decisions of this court. The Statute of Limitations is to be upheld and enforced, not as resting only on a presumption of payment from [235] lapse of time, but, according to its intent and object, as a statute of repose. The original debt, indeed, is a sufficient legal consideration for a subsequent new promise to pay it, made either before or after the bar of the statute is complete. But in order to continue or to revive the cause of action, after it would otherwise have been barred by the statute, there must be either an express promise of the debtor to pay that debt, or else an express acknowledgment of the debt, from which his promise to pay it may be inferred. A mere acknowledgment, though in writing, of the debt as having once existed, is not sufficient to raise an implication of such a new promise. To have this effect, there must be a distinct and unequivocal acknowledgment of the debt as still subsisting as a personal obligation of the debtor.

In King v. Riddle, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 168 [3: 304], a deed, dated July 15, 1804, by which the defendant recited that certain persons had become his sureties for a certain debt and had paid it, and that he was desirous to secure them as far as he could, and assigned to one of them certain bonds in trust to collect the money and distribute it equally among them, was admitted in evidence in an action by one of them against him for money paid, to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations of Virginia. The exact form of the deed is not stated in the report, but that it expressly recognized the debt to the plaintiff to be still due is evident from the opinion, in which Chief Justice Marshall said: "Although the court is not willing to extend the effect of casual or accidental expressions farther than it has been, to take a case out of that statute, and although the court might be of opinion that the cases on that point have gone too far, yet this is not a casual or incautious expression; the deed admits the debt to be due on the 15th of July, 1804, and five years had not afterwards elapsed before the suit was brought." P. 171 [305].

In Clementson v. Williams, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 72 [3: 491], in an action on an account against two partners, one of whom only was served with process, a previous statement of the other, upon the account being presented to him, "that [236] the said account was due, and that he supposed it had been paid by the defendant, but had not paid it himself, and did not know of its being ever paid," was held insufficient to take the account out of the statute; and Chief Justice Marshall said: "The Statute of Limitations is entitled to the same respect with other statutes, and ought not to be explained away. In this case there is no promise, conditional or unconditional, but a simple acknowledgment. This acknowledgment goes to the original justice of the account; but this is not enough. The Statute of Limitations was not enacted to protect persons from claims fictitious in their origin, but from ancient claims, whether well or ill founded, which may have been discharged, but the evidence of discharge may be lost. It is not then sufficient to take the case out of the Act, that the claim should be proved or be acknowledged to have been originally just; the acknowledgment must go to the fact that it is still due." P. 74 [492].

Chief Justice Marshall afterwards pointed out that in that case, although the partnership had been dissolved before the statement was made, the case was not determined upon that point, but upon the insufficiency of the acknowledgment; and added that, upon the principles there expressed by the court, "an acknowledgment which will revive the original cause of action must be unqualified and unconditional. It must show positively that the debt is due in whole or in part. If it be connected with circumstances which in any manner affect the claim, or, if it be conditional, it may amount to a new assumpsit for which the old debt is a sufficient consideration; or if it be construed to revive the original debt, that revival is conditional, and the performance of the condition, or a readiness to perform it, must be shown." Wetzell v. Bussard, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 309, 315 [6: 481, 483].

In Bell v. Morrison, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 351 [7: 174], Mr. Justice Story fully discussed the subject, and, after dwelling on the importance of giving the Statute of Limitations such support as to make it "what it was intended to be, emphatically, a statute of repose," and "not designed merely to raise a presumption of payment of a just debt, from lapse of time;" and repeating the passages above quoted from the opinions in Clementson v. Williams and Wetzell [237] v. Bussard, said: "We adhere to the doctrine thus stated, and think it the only exposition of the statute which is consistent with its true object and import. If the bar is sought to be removed by the proof of a new promise, that promise, as a new cause of action, ought to be proved in a clear and explicit manner, and be in its terms unequivocal and determinate; and, if any conditions are annexed, they ought to be shown to be performed. If there be no express promise but a promise is to be raised by implication of law from the acknowledgment of the party, such acknowledgment ought to contain an unqualified and direct admission of a previous, subsisting debt, which the party is liable and willing to pay. If there be accompanying circumstances, which repel the presumption of a promise or intention to pay; if the expressions be equivocal, vague and indeterminate, leading to no certain conclusion, but at best to probable inferences, which may affect different minds in different ways, we think they ought not to go to a jury as evidence of a new promise to revive the cause of action." P. 862 [179].

Again, in Moore v. Bank of Columbia, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 86 [8: 329], the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Thompson, after referring to the previous cases, reaffirmed the same doctrine, and said: "The principle clearly to be deduced from these cases is that in addition to the admission of a present, subsisting debt, there must be either an express promise to pay, or circumstances from which an implied promise may fairly be presumed." P. 93 [331].

In Randon v. Toby, 52 U. S. 11 How. 493 [13: 784], cited for the plaintiff, the agreement, which was held to take a case out of the statute, contained not only a pledge of property to secure the notes sued on, but an express stipulation that the notes should remain in as full force and effect as if they were renewed.

In Walsh v. Mayer, 111 U. S. 31 [28: 338], in answer to a letter from the holder of a note secured by mortgage, calling attention to the want of insurance on the mortgaged property, and saying: "The amount you owe me on the $7,500 note is too large to be left in such an unprotected condition, and I cannot consent to it," the mortgagors wrote to him that they expected to insure in about four months for twice that amount, and added: "We think you will run no risk in that time, as the property would [238] be worth the amount due you if the building was to burn down." This was held to be a sufficient acknowledgment, upon the ground that the words, both of the plaintiff's letter and of the defendant's reply, were in the present tense, and designated a subsisting personal liability, and that the unconditional acknowledgment of that liability, without making any pledge of property or other provision for its payment, carried an implication of a personal promise to pay it. The case was decided upon its own facts, and no intention to modify the principles established by the previous decisions was expressed or entertained by the court.

Within a year afterwards, in the latest case on the subject, the court expressly reaffirmed those principles. Fort Scott v. Hickman, 112 U. S. 150, 168, 164 [28: 636, 640].

In full accord with these views are the decisions in England under Stat. 9 Geo. IV, chap. 14, known as Lord Tenterden's Act, which only restricts the mode of proof by requiring that, in order to continue or revive the debt, an "acknowledgment or promise shall be made by or contained in some writing to be signed by the party chargeable thereby."

The English judges have repeatedly approved the statement of Mr. (afterwards Chief Justice) Jervis, that the writing must either contain an express promise to pay the debt, or be "in terms from which an unqualified promise to pay it is necessarily to be implied." Everett v. Robertson, 1 El. & El. 16, 19; Mitchell's Claim, L. R. 6 Ch. 822, 828; Morgan v. Rowlands, L. R. 7 Q. B. 493, 497; citing Jervis' New Rules, 4th ed. 350, note. And it has been often held that when the debtor, in the same writing by which he acknowledges the debt, without expressly promising to pay it, agrees that certain property shall be applied to its payment, there can be no implication of a personal promise to pay. Routledge v. Ramsay, 8 Ad. & El. 221; S. C. 3 Nev. & P. 319; Hoscutt v. Bonser, 3 Exch. 491; Cawley v Furnell, 12 C. B. 291; Everett v. Robertson, above cited.

The law upon this subject has been well [239] summed up by Vice Chancellor Wigram, as follows: "The legal effect of an acknowledgment of a debt barred by the Statute of Limitations is that of a promise to pay the old debt; and for this purpose the old debt is a consideration in law. In that sense, and for that purpose, the old debt may be said to be revived. It is revived as a consideration for a new promise. But the new promise, and not the old debt, is the measure of the creditor's right. If a debtor simply acknowledges an old debt, the law implies from that simple acknowledgment a promise to pay it: for which promise the old debt is a sufficient consideration. But if the debtor promises to pay the old debt when he is able, or by installments, or in two years, or out of a particular fund, the creditor can claim nothing more than the promise gives him." Philips v. Philips, 3 Hare, 281, 299, 300; Buckmaster v. Russell, 10 C. B. N. S. 745, 750.

In the most recent English case that has come under our notice, Lord Justice Bowen said: "Now, first of all, the acknowledgment must be clear, in order to raise the implication of a promise to pay. An acknowledgment which is not clear will not raise that inference. Secondly, supposing there is an acknowledgment of a debt which would if it stood by itself be clear enough, still, if words are found combined with it which prevent the possibility of the implication of the promise to pay arising, then the acknowledgment is not clear, within the meaning of the definition," "because the words express the lesser in such a way as to exclude the greater." Green v. Humphreys, 26 Ch. D. 474, 479, 480; S. C. 53 L. J. N. S. Ch. 625, 628.

In the light of the principles established by the authorities above referred to, it is quite clear that the instrument signed by the defendant on June 21, 1877, did not take the plaintiff's debt out of the statute.

This instrument contains no promise of the defendant personally to pay that debt, and no acknowledgment or mention of it as an existing liability. It begins with a reference, by way of consideration only, to the original debt, designating it as "the indebtedness described in the deed of trust" executed to the plaintiff at the time when that debt was contracted. The follows a pledge of a certain claim of the de-[240] fendant against the government, and its proceeds, to secure the payment of "said indebtedness, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent per annum until paid." This interest is mentioned, not as part of the consideration, or of the original debt, or as anything for which the defendant is liable, but only as something to the payment of which the claim pledged shall be applied. And the instrument concludes with a promise of the defendant that the proceeds of the claim pledged shall "be applied to the payment of said indebtedness, with interest as aforesaid, or to so much thereof as the sum or sums of money so received is or are sufficient to pay."

Although the old debt is expressly called, as it is in law, the consideration for the new agreement, this agreement, and not the old debt, is the measure of the plaintiff's right. The provisions for the payment of the debt and interest out of a particular fund exclude any implication of a personal promise to pay either. The whole instrument clearly evinces the defendant's intention in executing it to have been that the property pledged should be applied, so far as it would go, to the payment of the debt and interest, and not that his own personal liability should be increased or prolonged in any respect.

To imply from the terms of this instrument a promise of the defendant to pay the debt himself would be, in our opinion, to construe it against its manifest intent, and to fritter away the Statute of Limitations.

The result is that the judgment below must be reversed, and the verdict against the defendant set aside. It was contended by his counsel that this court should now direct judgment to be entered upon a former verdict, which was returned for him under a correct ruling on the question of acknowledgment, and set aside by the court in General Term upon a different view of the law. In support of this contention was cited Coughlin v. District of Columbia, 106 U. S. 7 [27: 74]. But the reason for ordering judgment upon the first verdict in that case was not that the court in General Term had wrongly decided a question of law upon a bill of exceptions allowed at the first trial; but that, as appeared of record, independently of [241] any bill of exceptions, the question had not been legally brought before it at all, thus leaving the first verdict in full force. In the present case, it had authority to entertain and pass upon the exceptions taken by the plaintiff at the first trial; when, in the exercise of that authority, it had sustained those exceptions and ordered a second trial, the case stood as if it had never been tried before; and only the rulings at the second trial, and no rulings, whether similar or different, at the former trial, could be brought to the General Term by the exceptions of the defendant, or to this court by his writ of error.

Judgment reversed, and case remanded to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, with directions to set aside the verdict and to order a new trial.

CHARLES L. DUNN, by ELLIS STONE GORMAN, His Guardian ad litem.

Removal of causes—when jurisdiction of state court ceases—issues of fact to be tried in circuit court—Acts of March 3, 1875, and March 3, 1887.

1. All issues of fact made upon the petition for removal must be tried in the circuit court; but the state court is at liberty to determine for itself whether, on the face of the record, a removal has been effected; and if it decides against the removal, its action will be reviewable in this court, after final judgment.

2. The theory on which it rests is that the record closes, so far as the question of removal is concerned, when the petition for removal is filed and the necessary security furnished. It presents then to the state court the pure question of law whether, admitting the facts stated in the petition for removal to be true, it appears on the face of the record that the petitioner is entitled to a removal of the suit.

Submitted May 12, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Minnesota. Reversed, Remanded.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Eppa Hunton and Jeff. Chandler, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. C. D. O'Brien and Enoch Totten, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court: [514]

This suit was brought in the District Court of Ramsey County, Minnesota, by Charles L. Dunn, a minor, to recover damages for personal injuries which he had received while traveling as a passenger on the railroad of the Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern Railway Company. The Company answered the complaint in the action, and then filed a petition under section 639 of the Revised Statutes, verified by the oath of its president, for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota, on the ground of prejudice and local influence. The petition was accompanied by the necessary security. It set forth that the Railway Company was an Iowa corporation, and consequently, in law, a citizen of that State, and Dunn, the plaintiff, a citizen of Minnesota. Under section 639 a suit cannot be removed from a state court to a Circuit Court of the United States, except it be one between a citizen of the State in which the suit was brought and a citizen of another State, and then only by the citizen of the latter State. Immediately on the presentation of the petition for removal, the attorney for the plaintiff filed a counter affidavit to the effect that the plaintiff was not a citizen of Minnesota, but of the Territory of Montana. No further proof being offered on this point, the court ruled that a case for removal had not been made out, and that the suit must be retained for trial. Accordingly a trial was afterwards had in the state court, which resulted in a judgment against the Company. An appeal was then taken to the Supreme Court of the State, where the judgment of the district court was in all respects affirmed, including the rulings on the question of removal. To reverse that judgment this writ of error was brought.

[515] The assignment of errors presents but a single question, and that is whether, as after the petition for removal had been filed the record showed on its face that the state court ought to proceed no further, it was competent for that court to allow an issue of fact to be made upon the statements in the petition, and to retain the suit because on that issue the Railway Company had not shown by testimony that the plaintiff was actually a citizen of Minnesota.

It must be confessed that previous to the cases of Stone v. South Carolina, 117 U. S. 432 [29: 962], and Carson v. Hyatt, 118 U. S. 279 [ante, 167], decided at the last term, the utterances of this court, on that question, had not always been as clear and distinct as they might have been. Thus, in Gordon v. Longest, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 97 [10: 900], in speaking of removals under section 12 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, it was said, p. 104 [902], "It must be made to appear to the satisfaction of the state court that the defendant is an alien, or a citizen of some other State than that in which the suit was brought;" and in Railway Co. v. Ramsey, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 328 [22: 824], that, "If upon the hearing of the petition it is sustained by the proof, the state court can proceed no further." In other cases expressions of a similar character are found, which seem to imply that the state courts were at liberty to consider the actual facts, as well as the law arising on the face of the record, after the presentation of the petition for removal. At the last term it was found that this question had become a practical one, about which there was a difference of opinion in the state courts, and to some extent in the circuit courts; and so, in deciding Stone v. South Carolina, we took occasion to say, "All issues of fact made upon the petition for removal must be tried in the circuit court; but the state court is at liberty to determine for itself whether, on the face of the record, a removal has been effected." It is true, as was remarked by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in Amy v. Manning, 144 Mass. 153, that this was not necessary to the decision in that case; but it was said on full consideration and with the view of announcing the opinion of the court on that subject. Only two weeks after that case was decided Carson v. Hyatt came up for determination, in which [516] the precise question was directly presented, as the allegation of citizenship in the petition for removal was contradicted by a statement in the answer, and it became necessary to determine what the fact really was. We there affirmed what had been said in Stone v. South Carolina, and decided that it was error in the state court to proceed further with the suit after the petition for removal was filed, because the circuit court alone had jurisdiction to try the question of fact which was involved. This rule was again recognized at this term in Carson v. Dunham, 121 U. S. 421 [ante, 992], and is in entire harmony with all that had been previously decided, though not with all that had been said in the opinions in some of the cases. To our minds it is the true rule and calculated to produce less inconvenience than any other.

The theory on which it rests is that the record closes, so far as the question of removal is concerned, when the petition for removal is filed and the necessary security furnished. It presents then to the state court a pure question of law, and that is, whether, admitting the facts stated in the petition for removal to be true, it appears on the face of the record, which includes the petition and the pleadings and proceedings down to that time, that the petitioner is entitled to a removal of the suit. That question the state court has the right to decide for itself; and if it errs in keeping the case, and the highest court of the State affirms its decision, this court has jurisdiction to correct the error, considering, for that purpose, only the part of the record which ends with the petition for removal. Stone v. South Carolina, 117 U. S. 432 [supra], and cases there cited.

But even though the state court should refuse to stop proceedings, the petitioning party may enter a copy of the record of that court, as it stood on the filing of his petition, in the circuit court, and have the suit docketed there. If the circuit court errs in taking jurisdiction, the other side may bring the decision here for review, after final judgment or decree, if the value of the matter in dispute is sufficient in amount. R. R Co. v. Koontz, 104 U. S. 5, 15 [26: 643, 646]. In that case, the same as in the writ of error to the state court, the question will be decided on the face of the part of the record of the state court which ends with the petition for removal; for the circuit court can [517] no more take a case until its jurisdiction is shown by the record than the state court can be required to let it go until the record shows that its jurisdiction has been lost. The questions in the two courts will be identical, and will depend on the same record; namely, that in the state court ending with the petition for removal. The record remaining in the state court will be the original; that in the circuit court an exact copy.

But, inasmuch as the petitioning party has the right to enter the suit in the circuit court, notwithstanding the state court declines to stop proceedings, it is easy to see that if both courts can try the issues of fact which may be made on the petition for removal, the records from the two courts brought here for review will not necessarily always be the same. The testimony produced before one court may be entirely different from that in the other, and the decisions of both courts may be right upon the facts as presented to them respectively. Such a state of things should be avoided if possible, and this can only be done by making one court the exclusive judge of the facts. Upon that question there ought not to be a divided jurisdiction. It must rest with one court alone, and that, in our opinion, is more properly the circuit court. The case can be docketed in that court on the first day of the next term, and the issue tried at once. If decided against the removal, the question is now, by the Act of March 3, 1887, chap. 373, 24 Stat. at L. 552, put at rest, and the jurisdiction of the state court established in the appropriate way. Under the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat at L. 470, such an order could have been brought here for review by appeal or writ of error; and to expedite such hearings our Rule 32 was adopted.

Upon this record as it now stands the state court was wrong in proceeding with the suit, and for that reason the judgment of the Supreme Court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

ELIAS R. VICKERS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 360-363.)

Practice—charge to jury—State Constitution.

A State Constitution cannot, any more than a state statute, prohibit the judges of the courts of the United States from charging juries with regard to matters of fact.

[No. 282.]

Argued and submitted May 2, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas. Affirmed.

The writ of error in this case brings up for review a judgment upon a verdict in the court below for $6,000 damages for personal injuries sustained by Vickers, the plaintiff below, while a passenger on a mixed passenger and freight train of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway Company, the defendant below.

[361] The Constitution of Arkansas, article VII, section 23, provides: "Judges shall not charge juries with regard to matters of fact, but shall declare the law; and in jury trials shall reduce their charge or instructions to writing on the request of either party."

In this case the matters of fact in issue were the alleged negligence of the defendant and contributory negligence of the plaintiff; and the question whether this constitutional provision should be followed by the federal courts sitting as courts of the common law in the State of Arkansas is presented.

Mr. John F. Dillon, for plaintiff in error.
Mr F. W. Compton, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This judgment is affirmed on the authority of Vicksburg & M. R. R. Co. v. Putnam, 118 U. S. 545 [ante, 257]; Nudd v. Burrows, 91 U. S. 426, 441 [23:286, 290]; Indianapolis etc. R. R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291, 299 [23:898, 900]. A State Constitution cannot, any more than a state statute, prohibit the judges of the courts of the United States from charging juries with regard to matters of fact.

v.

UNITED STATES, ex rel. JAMES L. LEWIS, Admr. of Estate of ELISHA FOOTE, Deceased.

(See S. C. "Seibert v. Lewis," Reporter's ed. 284-300.)

*Constitutional law—contracts—impairment of obligation—municipal bonds—provision for levy of special tax—whether new provision is equivalent to the old—Missouri Statutes—*mandamus to enforce collection of—injunction issued by state court.

1. The remedy subsisting in a State, when and where a contract is made and is to be performed, is a part of its obligation; and any subsequent law of the State which so affects that remedy as substantially to impair and lessen the value of the contract is forbidden by the Constitution, and is therefore void.

2. In a proceeding by mandamus to require the Collector of taxes to collect a special tax levied by the County Court of Cape Girardeau County, Missouri, to pay a judgment founded upon municipal obligations of said County, issued under the Missouri Act of March 23, 1868, to facilitate the construction of railroads in that State, it is held: that the provisions for levying and collecting such a tax, contained in sections 6798, 6799 and 6800, Revised Statutes of Missouri of 1879, are not a legal equivalent for the provision contained in said Act of March 23, 1868; that the right of the relator to have a special tax levied from to time, "in the same manner as county taxes" are levied, is part of the obligation of his contract which is impaired by a change in his remedy making it less efficacious than that provided at the same time for the collection of the general revenue of the County; that the laws of Missouri, in force for the collection of the tax to pay the judgment of the relator at the time it was rendered, continue to be and are still in force for that purpose; and that the respondent is not justified in his refusal to collect said special taxes by said statutory provisions relied upon by him, nor by an injunction issued by a state court.

3. Where a statute authorizing the issue of municipal bonds provides for the levy and collection of the special tax, "in the same manner as county taxes" are levied, for their payment, the obligation of the contract is impaired by any change in the remedy whereby it is rendered less efficacious than that which is at the time provided for securing the revenues of the county.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. D. A. McKnight, E. John Ellis and John Johns, for plaintiff in error:

The primary defense of the respondent is that the writ of mandamus has commanded him to do an illegal act, and this is sufficient in law.

State v. Perrine, 34 N. J. L. 254; Johnson v. Lucas, 11 Humph. (Tenn.) 307; State v. Judge of Orphans Ct. 15 Ala. 740; Knox Co. Comrs. v. Aspinwall, 65 U. S. 24 How. 376 (16:735).

The federal courts will lean towards an agreement with the decisions of the state courts in the matter of the construction of their statutes.

Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 33 (27:365); Anderson v. Santa Anna Township, 116 U. S. 356 (29:633); Norton v. Shelby Co. 118 U. S. 425 (ante, 178).

Where this court has ignored certain preliminary requirements of the statutes of the State, in the matter of levying and collecting taxes, it has been where they were nonessentials, and not where they were commanded under penalty of criminal punishment.

Hawley v. Fairbanks, 108 U. S. 543 (27: 820); Labette Co. Comrs. v. U. S. 112 U. S. 217 (28: 698).

In directing the plaintiff in error by this writ of mandamus to do an unlawful act, expressly forbidden, the circuit court exceeded its jurisdiction.

Knox Co. Comrs. v. Aspinwall, supra; Supervisors v. U. S. 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 71 (21: 771); Barkley v. Levee Comrs. 98 U. S. 258 (28: 893); U. S. v. Clarke Co. 95 U. S. 769 (24: 545); Memphis v. U. S. 97 U. S. 293 (24: 920); U. S. v. Macon Co. 99 U. S. 582 (25: 331); Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S. 472 (26: 197); Ex parte Rowland, 104 U. S. 604 (26: 861).

The writ of the circuit court, directing the plaintiff in error to collect the taxes illegally levied under the statute, was in effect a levy and collection by the circuit court, and was, therefore, beyond its power.

Rees v. Watertown, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 107 (22; 72); Heine v. Levee Comrs. Id. 655 (22: 223); Meriwether v. Garrett, supra; People v. Chicago & A. R. R. Co. 55 Ill. 96; Williams v. County Comrs. 35 Me. 345.

A writ of mandamus cannot compel a levy in any other time or manner than that provided by law.

Supervisors v. Klein, 51 Miss. 807; People v. Westford, 53 Barb. 555.

When this court has held the legislative action of a State, enacted subsequently to the issue of the bonds, to be void, it has been in cases where the new law substantially prevented the satisfaction of the judgment.

Board of Liquidation v. McComb, 92 U. S. 531 (23: 623); Case Co. v. Johnston, 95 U. S. 360 (24: 416); Murray v. Charleston, 96 U. S. 432 (24: 760); Memphis v. U. S. supra; U. S. v. Mayor etc. of N. O. 108 U. S. 358 (26: 895); Ralls Co. Ct. v. U. S. 105 U. S. 733 (26: 1220); Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S. 711 (27: 448); Louisiana v. Police Jury, 116 U. S. 131 (29: 587).

In the following tax cases, where the court held the subsequent legislation void, it was because the satisfaction of the judgment, in whole or in part, was absolutely prevented.

U. S. Quincy, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 535 (18: 403); Galena v. U. S. 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 705 (18: 560); Butz v. City of Muscatine, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 575 (19: 490); Broughton v. Pensacola, 93 U. S. 266 (23: 896); Mt. Pleasant v. Beckwith, 100 U. S. 514 (25: 699); Ex parte Rowland, supra; Louisiana v. Pilsbury, 105 U. S. 278 (26: 1090); County Comrs. v. Wilson, 109 U. S. 621 (27: 1053); Quincy v. U. S. 113 U. S. 332 (28: 1001); Mobile v. Watson, 116 U. S. 289 (29. 620).

But here a substantial equivalent for the original manner of levying the tax has been furnished, by which the judgment may be fully satisfied, and hence the obligation of the contract is unimpaired.

U. S. v. Mayor etc. of N. O. and Ralls Co. Ct. v. U. S. supra; Antoni v. Greenhow, 107 U. S. 769 (27: 468); Port of Mobile v. Watson, 116 U. S. 289 (29: 620); U. S. v. Mobile, 12 Fed. Rep. 768; Curtis v. Whitney, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 68 (20: 513).

The new method of levying the tax prescribed in the Revised Statutes of 1879 was simple and efficacious, and the circuit court's writ of mandamus to the county court was a perfect means of setting the machinery in motion.

State v. Rainey, 74 Mo. 229.

This court has recognized the right of the State of Missouri to amend the Act of 1868, under which these bonds were issued, in matters within its discretion.

Cape Girardeau Co. Ct. v. U. S. 118 U. S. 68 (ante, 78).

It is within the discretion of the Legislature of a State to change the form of levying and collecting taxes; and of this the bondholders cannot complain.

U. S. v. Quincy, supra.

The States has the right to determine the manner of assessing and levying taxes; and the decision of its courts on these questions is binding on the federal courts.

Witherspoon v. Duncan, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 210 (18: 339); Bailey v. Magwire, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 215 (22: 850).

In this case the validity of the judgment on these bonds, and the obligation of the mandamus to the county court, are not denied. But the Collector, an officer of the State, has, at the suit of the State, been enjoined from violating a positive law of the State, and the injunction has been sustained by its supreme court. In the case below, and other cases, the injunction, which this court has said could not be set up as a defense against a writ of mandamus from a federal court, issued at the suit of the defaulting debtor.

Riggs v. Johnson Co. 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 166 (18: 768); Mayor of Davenport v. U. S. 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 409 (19: 704); Supervisors v. Durant, Id. 415 (19: 732); Hawley v. Fairbanks, 108 U. S. 546 (27: 821).

Messrs. J. B. Henderson and James M. Lewis, for defendant in error:

The relator, as a matter of right, is entitled to a writ of mandamus subjecting both real and personal property to the payment of his judgment. The amendatory Act was not repealed until March 24, 1885. The judgment was obtained during its existence as a law.

Cape Girardeau Co. Ct. v. Hill, 118 U. S. 68 (ante, 73); U. S v. Johnson Co. 5 Dill. 208.

The state courts cannot interfere by injunction to defeat the writ of the federal courts or to restrain state officers from the performance of ministerial duties enjoined on them in pursuance of and in obedience to such writs.

Riggs v. Johnson Co. 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 166 (18: 768); State v. Rainey, 74 Mo. 229; M'Kim v. Voorhies, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 279 (3: 342); Slocum v. Mayberry, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 9 (4: 171); Beers v. Haughton, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 359 (9: 157); Ableman v. Booth, 62 U. S. 21 How. 516 (16: 178); Peck v. Jenness, 48 U. S. 7 How. 612 (12: 841); U. S. v. Peters, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 115 (3: 53).

The laws which subsist at the time and place of making a contract enter into and form a part of it; and the rule embraces all Acts that affect the validity, the construction, the enforcement, or the discharge of the contract.

Von Hoffman v. Quincy, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 535 (18: 403); Planters Bank v. Sharp, 47 U. S. 6 How. 301 (12: 447); Green v. Biddle, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 1 (5: 547); U. S. v. Johnson Co. 5 Dill. 208.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding by mandamus in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. The alternative writ recites that in 1883 a peremptory writ of mandamus was issued by the court, commanding the County Court of Cape Girardeau County and the judges thereof to make a levy on all the real estate and personal property in Cape [285] Girardeau Township subject to taxation, including statements of merchants and manufacturers doing business in said township, and that thereupon the county court, in obedience to the command of said writ, on the 23d day of May, 1883, during a regular term of said county court, made an order on their records, whereby it was ordered that, for the purpose of paying the judgments of Elisha Foote, the Ninth National Bank of New York, John T. Hill, Valentine Winter, and George W. Harshman, amounting to $14,288.20, and interest and costs, a tax of 2 per cent be levied on all the real estate and personal property in Cape Girardeau Township subject to taxation, including statements of merchants and manufacturers doing business in said township, and the clerk of the county court was ordered to extend said tax in a separate column on the tax book of said county for the year 1883. That, in obedience to said order, the special tax ordered to be levied as aforesaid was, by the clerk of said court, entered upon and extended in a separate column of the regular tax book of Cape Girardeau County for the year 1883; and, upon the completion of said tax book, the same was delivered in the time and in the manner required by law for the year 1883 to James M. Seibert, Collector, who was then and there the Collector of taxes, duly elected and qualified as such, and acting therein for the year 1883; and the said Collector was then and there ordered by the county court to proceed and collect the said special tax in the same manner as other taxes, state and county, were authorized to be collected for the said year 1883 in said county; and that after the receipt of the said tax book, the said Collector, claiming to be prevented from proceeding in the collection of said tax by an injunction issued by the judge of the 10th Judicial Circuit of the State of Missouri, upon a petition therefor, filed in the name of the State of Missouri upon the relation of the prosecuting attorney of that county, announced his determination to abstain from all efforts to demand, sue for, or collect any part of said special tax, and refused to proceed farther therein.

The return of the respondent, Seibert, to the alternative writ admits the facts therein stated, [286] and sets out at length the petition for injunction referred to therein, filed on the 29th of December, 1883. The petition, filed in the name of the State of Missouri by the prosecuting attorney of the county, prays for an injunction against the collection of the tax, on the ground that it was not a state tax, nor a tax necessary to pay the funded or bonded indebtedness of the State, nor a tax for current county expenses or schools, or either, and "that said county court, before making the levy and order as aforesaid, did not make or cause to be made an application to the circuit court of said county, nor to the judge thereof, in vacation, for an order to have assessed, levied and collected said 2 per cent tax; nor was any such order in fact made by such court or the judge thereof, in vacation. That, on the contrary, said county court, in violation of the statutes in such cases made and provided and in usurpation of their power, have assessed and levied, and are now trying to have collected, said 2 per cent tax at its assessed valuation of all the taxable property of said township, without said permission or order of said court, in violation of their duties and without authority of law."

And further, that the levy of the 2 per cent tax was made for the purpose of paying off a portion of a bonded debt contracted in behalf of Cape Girardeau Township by virtue of the Act of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, approved March 23, 1868, in aid of railroads, and is in violation of that Act because levied on the personal property within said township as well as on the real estate therein.

The return further sets out that the injunction as prayed for was granted, and the respondent says that, in obedience to the said writ of injunction, he has ceased to collect or to endeavor to collect said special tax, the said injunction being still in force.

The respondent in his return further states "that he is ready and willing to do and perform every duty devolved upon him as Collector as aforesaid, so far as he legally may, but submits whether he ought to be required to collect the said special tax so as aforesaid levied by the said County Court of Cape Girardeau County, [287] because, as he is informed by counsel, the same was not levied in the mode and manner required by the laws of the State of Missouri, as set forth in sections 6798 and 6799 of the Revised Statutes, concerning the assessment and collection of the revenue, and it is made a criminal offense, punishable by fine of not less than $500 and forfeiture of office, for any officer in the State of Missouri to collect or attempt to collect any tax or taxes other than those specified and enumerated in section 6798 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri, without being ordered so to do by the Circuit Court of the County, or the judge thereof in vacation, in the manner provided and directed in section 6799 of said Revised Statutes. And respondent submits that the said special tax is not a tax specified and enumerated in section 6798 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri, and that no order was made by the Circuit Court of Cape Girardeau County directing the said county court to have assessed, levied and collected such special tax as required by section 6799 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri, and that he is informed by counsel that the said levy of such special tax so as aforesaid made by said county court is illegal and void, and that respondent cannot collect or attempt to collect the same without violating the criminal laws of the State of Missouri."

To this return the relator demurred generally. The demurrer was sustained and a peremptory writ ordered to issue, and thereupon the respondent sued out the present writ of error.

It is conceded that the relator's judgment, which he is now seeking to collect, was founded upon municipal obligations of Cape Girardeau County, issued under the authority of an Act to facilitate the construction of railroads in the State of Missouri, which took effect March 23, 1868. Mo. Laws of 1868, p. 92. The second section of that Act is as follows:

"Sec. 2. In order to meet the payments on account of the subscription to the stock, according to its terms, or to pay the interest and principal on any bond which may be issued on account of such subscription, the county court shall, from time to time, levy and cause to be collected, in the same manner as county taxes, a special tax, which shall be levied on all the real estate lying within the township making the subscription in accordance with the valuation then last made by the county assessor for county purposes."

It will be observed that the tax authorized by this section of the Statute of 1868, under which [291] the bonds were issued, is to be levied on the real estate within the township only, and not upon the personal property, including statements of merchants and manufacturers doing business in the township. But this levy upon personal property and merchants' licenses, in addition to real estate, is authorized by an amendment passed March 10, 1871. 1 Wag. Stat. 1872, p. 318, § 52. As thus amended, the section reads as follows:

"In order to meet the payments on account of the subscription to the stock according to its terms, or to pay the interest and principal on any bond which may be issued on account of such subscription, the county court shall, from time to time, levy and cause to be collected, in the same manner as county taxes, a special tax, which shall be levied on all the real estate and personal property, including all statements of merchants doing business within said * * * township, * * * lying and being within the township making the subscription, in accordance with the valuation then last made by the county assessor for county purposes," etc.

That the relator was entitled to a tax levied in pursuance of this amended section, his judgment having been obtained while it was in force, was adjudged in his favor by the circuit court when he obtained his peremptory mandamus against the judges of the county court, requiring them to levy the tax, the collection of which he is now seeking to enforce by the present proceeding. The question was also directly adjudged in his favor by this court in the case of Cape Girardeau County Ct. v. Hill, 118 U. S. 68 [ante, 78]. In that case it was said: "The township having legally incurred an obligation to pay the bonds in question, it was competent for the Legislature at any time to make provision for its being met by taxation upon any kind of property within the township that was subject to taxation for public purposes."

Having obtained his judgment while that Act remained in force, and having obtained by the judgment of the circuit court an actual levy of a tax according to its provisions, his right thereto became thereby vested so as not to be affected by a subsequent repeal of the statute. But on March 8, 1879, the General Assembly of the State of Missouri passed an Act, found in sections 6798, 6799, and 6800 of the Revised [292] Statutes of Missouri of 1879, which read as follows:

"Sec. 6798. Taxes, how assessed, levied and collected.—The following named taxes shall hereafter be assessed, levied, and collected in the several counties in this State, and only in the manner and not to exceed the rates prescribed by the Constitution and laws of this State, viz.: the State tax and the tax necessary to pay the funded or bonded debt of the State, the tax for current county expenditures, and for schools.

"Sec. 6799. Procedure, limitations and conditions.—No other tax for any purpose shall be assessed, levied, or collected, except under the following limitations and conditions, viz.: the prosecuting attorney or county attorney of any county—upon the request of the county court of such county, which request shall be of record with the proceedings of said court, and such court being first satisfied that there exists a necessity for the assessment, levy, and collection of other taxes than those enumerated and specified in the preceding section—shall present a petition to the circuit court of his county, or to the judge thereof in vacation, setting forth the facts and specifying the reasons why such other tax or taxes should be assessed, levied, and collected; and such circuit court, or judge thereof, upon being satisfied of the necessity for such other tax or taxes, and that the assessment, levy, and collection thereof will not be in conflict with the Constitution and laws of this State, shall make an order directed to the county court of such county, commanding such court to have assessed, levied, and collected such other tax or taxes, and shall enforce such order by mandamus or otherwise.

"Sec. 6800. Assessment, levy and collection not to be made except as provided.—Any county court judge, or other county officer in this State, who shall assess, levy, or collect, or who shall attempt to assess, levy, or collect, or cause to be assessed, levied, or collected, any tax or taxes other than those specified and enumerated in section six thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, without being first ordered so to do by the circuit court of the county or the judge thereof, in the express manner provided and directed in section six thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, [293]
upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not less than five hundred dollars, and, in addition to such punishment, his office shall become vacant; and the method herein provided for the assessment, levy, and collection of any tax or taxes not enumerated and specified in section six thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, shall be the only method known to the law whereby such tax or taxes may be assessed or collected, or ordered to be assessed, levied, or collected."

By these provisions, it appears that the state tax and the tax necessary to pay the funded or bonded debt of the State, the tax for the current county expenditures, and for schools, are to be assessed, levied, and collected in the several counties of the State as a matter of positive duty by the county courts of the several counties, according to their previous practice, without the intervention of any other authority. All other taxes, which include the tax sought to be collected in this proceeding, can be assessed, levied and collected only under the limitations and conditions therein prescribed; that is to say, the county court being first satisfied that there exists a necessity for the assessment, levy and collection of such other tax, shall request the prosecuting attorney for the county to present a petition to the circuit court of the county, or to the judge thereof in vacation, setting forth the facts, and specifying the reasons why such other tax or taxes should be assessed, levied and collected. In pursuance of that request the prosecuting attorney is required to present such a petition, and the circuit court, or judge thereof, to whom such petition is presented, shall make an order directed to the county court of such county, commanding such court to have assessed, levied, and collected such tax, "upon being satisfied of the necessity for such other tax or taxes, and that the assessment, levy, and collection thereof will not be in conflict with the Constitution and laws of this State." Section 6800 provides that any county court judge, or other county officer, who shall assess, levy or collect, or attempt so to do, or cause to be assessed, levied or collected, any tax, without being first ordered so to do by the circuit court of the county, in the express manner provided and directed in the preceding section, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, to be punished, on conviction, by a fine of not less than $500 and a forfeiture of his office; and it is therein declared that "The method herein provided for the assessment, levy, and collection of any tax or taxes not enumerated and specified in section 6798, shall be the only method known to the law whereby such tax or taxes may be assessed or collected, or ordered to be assessed, levied or collected."

It is because of these provisions of the law that the respondent herein, as he sets out in his return, has been restrained by an injunction from the Circuit Court of Cape Girardeau County from further proceeding in the collection of the tax heretofore levied by the county court by virtue of a writ of mandamus from the Circuit Court of the United States.

The question presented for our determination is whether, by virtue of this statute of the State, he is justified in his disobedience to the judgment and mandate of the Circuit Court of the United States. It is well settled by the decisions of this court that "The remedy subsisting in a State, when and where the contract is made and is to be performed, is a part of its obligation, and any subsequent law of the State which so affects that remedy as substantially to impair and lessen the value of the contract is forbidden by the Constitution, and is therefore void." Edwards v. Kearsey, 96 U. S. 595, 607 [24:793, 798].

It had been previously said upon a review of the decisions of the court, in Von Hoffman v. Quincy, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 535, 553 [18: 403, 409]: "It is competent for the States to change the form of the remedy, or to modify it otherwise as they may see fit, provided no substantial right secured by the contract is thereby impaired. No attempt has been made to fix definitely the line between alterations of the remedy which are to be deemed legitimate and those which, under the form of modifying the remedy, impair substantial rights. Every case must be determined upon its own circumstances. Whenever the result last mentioned is produced the Act is within the prohibition of the Constitution, and to that extent void."

In Bronson v. Kinzie, 42 U. S. 1 How. 311 [11:143], Chief Justice Taney said: "It is difficult, perhaps, to draw a line that would be applicable in all cases between legitimate alterations of the remedy and provisions which, in the form of remedy, impair the right. But it is manifest that the obligation of the contract, and the rights of a party under it, may, in effect, be destroyed by denying a remedy altogether; or may be seriously impaired by burdening the proceedings with new conditions and restrictions, so as to make the remedy hardly worth pursuing."

In Louisiana v. New Orleans, 102 U. S. 203, 206 [26:132, 133], Mr. Justice Field, in the opinion of the court, said: "The obligation of a contract, in the constitutional sense, is the means provided by law by which it can be enforced—by which the parties can be obliged to perform it. Whatever legislation lessens the efficacy of these means impairs the obligation. If it tend to postpone or retard the enforcement of the contract, the obligation of the latter is to that extent weakened."

In various forms, but with the same meaning, this rule has been often repeated in subsequent decisions by this court. It is therefore not denied in argument in the present case that section 2 of the Act of March 23, 1868, under which the municipal obligations of the relator which had passed into judgment were issued, constitutes a part of the contract to the benefit of which he is entitled. That section, it will be remembered, provides that to pay the interest and principal on any bond which may be issued under the authority thereof, "the county court shall from time to time levy and cause to be collected, in the same manner as county taxes, a special tax," etc.

The precise question, therefore, for present adjudication is whether the provisions for levying and collecting such a tax, contained in the sections of the Revised Statutes above quoted, are, in view of the doctrine of this court on that subject, a legal equivalent for the provision contained in the Act of March 23, 1868. The affirmative of that proposition is contended for by the plaintiff in error. The argument in support of that position is that the machinery provided for the collection of such a tax in section 6799 is purely formal; that it does not touch the substance of the right to have the tax levied and collected, nor does it embarrass and impede it by any unreasonable hindrance or delay. It is said that, according to its terms, under a judgment upon such municipal bonds and coupons in a Circuit Court of the United States, it would be the duty of the county court to enter of record that it was satisfied of the existence of the necessity for the levy and collection of such a tax, and thereupon to request the prosecuting attorney to file his petition to the circuit court of the county to obtain the proper order therefor; that it would then be the duty of the prosecuting attorney to file such a petition, and that the circuit court, or a judge thereof, on the production of the judgment required to be paid, would be satisfied of the necessity for such tax, and that the assessment, levy and collection thereof would not be in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the State, even although he might be of the opinion that the bonds themselves were not valid according to the laws of the State; and that, accordingly, the order would be made and directed to the county court, commanding that court to have assessed, levied, and collected the tax, the necessity for the collection of which they had already declared upon their own records.

The point of the argument pressed upon us seems to be that the judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States upon the bonds and coupons would necessarily be conclusive, in the opinion of the county court and of the prosecuting attorney and of the circuit court of the county, upon all matters of law and of fact which otherwise, by this section of the statute, would be committed to the exercise of their judicial discretion; and that, consequently, everything to be done by them under the provisions of that section would thereby become merely ministerial, so that, in case of their refusal to act, they would be subject, at the suit of the judgment creditor, to a proceeding by mandamus to compel them to proceed in the assessment, levy, and collection of the tax to which he was entitled.

But the contract which the relator is entitled to insist upon under the Act of March 23, 1868, is that he shall have a special tax for the payment of the principal and interest due him, to be levied from time to time "in the same manner as county taxes." It may be admitted that the Legislature, from time to time, notwithstanding this provision, might by subsequent [297] legislation change the mode and the means for the assessment, levy and collection of county taxes, as in its judgment the public interests should require. Any such changes, made in view of public interests, not substantially to the prejudice of public creditors, might be considered, in respect to them, as the legal equivalent for the particular mode in force in 1868, and a fair and reasonable substitute therefor. Ordinarily, it would be true that such altered provisions would not be injurious to any private rights, for the creditor would at all times have the guaranty of as prompt and speedy a collection of a tax in satisfaction of his claim as is secured by law for the collection of the revenues of the county most important for the support of its government.

It may, therefore, be considered as a most material and important part of the contract contained in the second section of the Act of March 23, 1868, not perhaps, that the creditor shall always have a right to have taxes for his benefit collected in the same manner in which county taxes were collectible at that date, but that he shall at least always have the right to a special tax to be levied and collected in the same manner as county taxes at the same time may be levied and collected. In other words, the essential part and value of the contract is that he shall always have a special tax to be collected in a manner as prompt and efficacious as that which shall, at the time when he applies for it, be provided by law for the collection of the general revenue of the county. His contract is not only that he shall have as good a remedy as that provided by the terms of the contract when made, but that his remedy shall be by means of a tax, in reference to which the levy and collection shall be as efficacious as the State provides for the benefit of its counties, without any discrimination against him.

It is in this vital point that the obligation of the contract with the relator has been impaired by the section of the law under which the respondent seeks to justify his disobedience of the mandate of the circuit court. Those sections provide one mode for the collection of county taxes by the direct action of the county court; they provide another mode for the collection of the special tax for the payment of [298] obligations such as those held by the relator and merged in his judgment. They expressly declare that he shall not be entitled to a tax collected in the same manner as county taxes, but add limitations and conditions, which, whatever may have been the legislative motive, compared with the original remedy provided by the law for the satisfaction of his contract, cannot fail seriously to embarrass, hinder and delay him in the collection of his debt, and which make an express and injurious discrimination against him.

We are referred by counsel for the plaintiff in error to the case of Hawley v. Fairbanks, 108 U. S. 543 [27: 820], as an authority in support of his contention. In that case, however, a peremptory mandamus was awarded to compel the levy and collection of a tax for the payment of a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States, notwithstanding an injunction to the contrary issued out of the state court. And it was there held that the judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States against the municipality was a sufficient warrant and authority to the county clerk to make the assessment of a tax for its payment, notwithstanding the omission of the preliminary certificates of the town clerk and the allowance by the board of auditors of the town, which in other cases the law made necessary to the orderly levy and collection of the tax.

We have also been furnished with the opinion of the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri, in the case of State v. Judges of County Court, Cape Girardeau County, 8 West. Rep. 626, delivered March 21, 1887, affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court of Cape Girardeau County, perpetuating the injunction set up in the return of the respondent in this case as an answer to the alternative mandamus. The judge delivering the opinion of the court says: "It has been ruled by this court that taxes of the nature now in question can only be levied and collected in the manner provided in said section (section 6799), and that unless the methods prescribed are pursued, the failure to pursue them, when, as here, they are the conditions essential to the exercise of the power, will render the tax invalid. State v. Hannibal & St. Jo. R. R. Co. 87 Mo. 236 [7 West. Rep. [299] 236]. Here, those methods, those conditions precedent, were not followed; and hence the county court, having no inherent power to levy a tax, and deriving its only authority from the State, must of necessity pursue the course in this regard marked out by the sovereign authority—by its laws." The court further proceeds to say that the matter is not affected by the mandate of the federal court, in reference to which the opinion proceeds as follows: "If, as already seen, the county court was powerless to act except when acting in conformity to express statutory conditions, it was still the duty of the judges to comply with those conditions while yielding obedience to the mandate aforesaid; for, outside of those statutory conditions, they were utterly powerless to act. Indeed, under section 6800, they were punishable for a misdemeanor in failing to comply with the provisions of section 6799 before levying the tax. It does not stand to reason that their act could be valid, and at the same time punishable as a crime. State v. Garroutte, 67 Mo. 445. If the statutory provisions being discussed were of such a nature as to cut off those who obtained the judgments from enforcing the obligations held by them, then the authorities cited on their behalf might apply. I understand that it is within the power of the State to change the remedy, so long as it does not essentially affect the right embodied in the contract; and that such change, thus made, does not infract the rule that forbids the contract to be impaired."

The opinion assumes that the remedy for the collection of the tax provided by the sections of the Revised Statutes of Missouri referred to is legally equivalent to that contained in section 2 of the Act of March 28, 1868, the differences between them not appearing to have been considered. It also assumes, for that reason, that those provisions of the Revised Statutes are the only laws in force for the collection of such a tax—those in force in 1871, when the judgment of the circuit court was rendered, having been repealed.

For the reasons which we have pointed out, we are unable to concur in the judgment of the Supreme Court of Missouri, and are constrained to hold that the sections of the Revised Statutes in question impair the obligation [300] of the contract with the relator under the Act of March 28, 1868, and as to him are, therefore, null and void by force of the Constitution of the United States; and that the laws of Missouri, for the collection of the tax necessary to pay his judgment, in force at the time when it was rendered, continue to be and are still in force for that purpose. They are the laws of the State which are applicable to his case. When he seeks and obtains the writ of mandamus from the Circuit Court of the United States, for the purpose of levying a tax for the payment of the judgment which it has rendered in his favor, he asks and obtains only the enforcement of the laws of Missouri under which his rights became vested, and which are preserved for his benefit by the Constitution of the United States. The question, therefore, is not whether a tax shall be levied in Missouri without the authority of its law, but which of several of its laws are in force and govern the case. Our conclusion is that the statutory provisions relied upon by the respondent in his return to the alternative writ of mandamus do not apply, and do not therefore, afford the justification which he pleads.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is accordingly affirmed.

BENJAMIN P. RUNKLE, Appt., [543]
v.
UNITED STATES.

UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.
BENJAMIN P. RUNKLE.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 543-561.)

Court martial—limited jurisdiction of—sentence—approval by President—his action judicial—form of approval—sufficiency of—sentence dismissing Benjamin P. Runkle—no action by Presidents Grant or Hayes shown—effect of—longevity pay and regular pay.

1. The sentence of a general court martial, in time of peace, to the effect that a commissioned officer be cashiered, is inoperative until approved by the President. The action required of the President is judicial in character, not administrative; and his power to act cannot be delegated to another.

2. The order of the President approving the proceedings and sentence of a court martial is not sufficient in form unless it is authenticated in a way to show otherwise than argumentatively that it is the result of the judgment of the President himself, and that it is not a mere departmental order which might or might not have attracted his personal attention.

3. In the case presented upon appeal from the court of claims, it is held: that it does not positively and distinctly appear from the record that the sentence of the court martial dismissing Benjamin P. Runkle from the Army was approved by President Grant; that it does appear that said sentence was disapproved by President Hayes; that said Runkle was never legally out of the service; and that he is entitled to his longevity pay, as well as his regular pay both before and after the revocation of the order of the Secretary of War, announcing that he was cashiered.

4. A court martial organized under the laws of the United States is a court of special and limited jurisdiction. Its authority is statutory and must be strictly pursued. The facts necessary to show its jurisdiction and that its sentences are conformable to law must be stated positively, and not left to be argumentatively inferred.

[Nos. 259, 260.]

Argued and submitted April 22, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

APPEALS from the Court of Claims. Fully reported below, 19 Ct. Cl. 396. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. M. F. Morris, George W. McCrary and Donn Piatt, for Benjamin P. Runkle.

Mr. Howard, Assist. Atty-Gen., for the United States, submitted the case on the record.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This record shows that on the 14th of September, 1882, Benjamin P. Runkle filed in the office of the Second Auditor of the Treasury Department a claim, based on the decision of [544] this court in United States v. Tyler, 105 U. S. 244 [26:985], for longevity pay as an officer in the Army of the United States, "retired from active service," and that on the 27th of June, 1883, the Secretary of the Treasury referred it to the court of claims, under section 2 of the Act of March 3, 1883, chap. 116, 22 Stat. at L. 485, for an opinion upon the following questions:

"1. Was the court martial that tried Benjamin P. Runkle duly and regularly organized, and had it jurisdiction of the person of said Runkle, and of the charges upon which he was tried?

"2. Were the proceedings and findings of said court martial regular and the sentence duly approved in part by the President of the United States, as required by law?

"3. Was Benjamin P. Runkle legally cashiered and dismissed from the Army of the United States, in pursuance of said court martial and subsequent proceedings?

[545] "4. Was the President of the United States authorized and empowered by executive order to restore said Runkle to the Army, as it is claimed he was restored by the order of August 4, 1877?

"5. Is Benjamin P. Runkle now a retired army officer, with the rank of major, and, as such officer, entitled to longevity pay under what is known as the Tyler decision?"

Runkle thereupon filed his petition in the court of claims, in accordance with the rules of practice in that court applicable to such cases, and the United States put in a counterclaim for "$23,585.62, moneys paid to the said claimant by the Paymaster-General and his subordinates, without authority of law, being the pay and allowances of a major in the Army upon the retired list, from the 4th day of August, 1877, to January 1, 1884, during which period the said claimant was not a major in the Army, nor in any way authorized to draw pay and allowances as aforesaid."

The facts as found by the court of claims are as follows:

I.

April 22, 1861, the claimant was mustered in as a Captain of the 13th Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and served as such till November 8, 1861, when he was mustered in as major. August 18, 1862, he was honorably mustered out.

August 19, 1862, he was mustered in as Colonel of the 45th Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and honorably mustered out July 21, 1864.

August 29, 1864, he accepted appointment as Lieutenant-Colonel of Veteran Reserve Corps, and was honorably mustered out October 5, 1866.

October 6, 1866, he accepted appointment as Major of 45th U. S. Infantry, became unassigned, March 15, 1869, and was placed on the retired list as Major U. S. Army, December 15, 1870.

II.

At the time he was so placed on the retired [546] list he was on duty as a disbursing officer of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands for the State of Kentucky, and had been on that duty from April 11, 1867; and continued on it without any new assignment to it, until he was arrested for trial before a court martial, as hereinafter shown.

III.

June 25, 1872, the following Special Order, No. 146, was issued by the War Department:

"1. By direction of the President, a general court martial is hereby appointed to meet at Louisville, Kentucky, on the 5th day of July, 1872, or as soon thereafter as practicable, for the trial of 2d Lieutenant John L. Graham, 13th Infantry, and such other prisoners as may be brought before it."

Before the court martial convened and organized under this order, the said Runkle was arraigned and tried on the following charges:

Charge I. "Violation of the Act of Congress approved March 2, 1863, chapter 67, section 1."

Charge II. "Conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman."

The specifications presented under these charges were all based on acts alleged to have been done by the claimant while on duty as a disbursing officer of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands. There were thirteen specifications under the first charge, and fourteen under the second. All the specifications averred acts done by him in the year 1871, except the first and 5th under charge I, and the first, 5th and 14th under charge II, all of which averred acts done in 1870, before he was placed on the retired list. Of the first and 5th specifications under charge I, and of the 14th under charge II, he was found guilty. He was also found guilty of ten other specifications under charge I, and of five other specifications under charge II, all of which averred acts done by him in 1871. He was also found guilty of both charges, and was sentenced by the court to be cashiered; to pay the United States a fine of $7,500; and to be confined in such penitentiary as the President of the United States might direct, for the period of four years; and in the event of the nonpayment of the fine at the expiration of four years, that he should be kept in confinement in the penitentiary until the fine be paid; the total term of imprisonment, however, not to exceed eight years.

IV.

The proceedings, findings and sentence of [547] said court martial were transmitted to the Secretary of War, who wrote upon the record the following order:

"The proceedings in the foregoing case of Major Benjamin P. Runkle, retired, United States Army, are approved, with the exception of the action of the court in rejecting as evidence a certain letter written by a witness for the prosecution, and offered to impeach his credibility; also in unduly restricting the cross examination of the same witness in relation to the motives influencing his testimony.

"Inasmuch, however, as in the review of the case it was determined that the whole testimony of this witness could be excluded from consideration without impairing the force of the testimony for the prosecution, upon which the findings rest, the erroneous action of the court in this respect does not affect the validity of the sentence.

"The findings and sentence are approved.

"In view of the unanimous recommendation by the members of the court that accused shall receive executive clemency on account of his gallant services during the war, and of his former good character, and in consideration of evidence, by affidavits presented to the War Department since his trial, showing that accused is now, and was at the time when his offense was committed, suffering under great infirmity in consequence of wounds received in battle, and credible representations having been made that he would be utterly unable to pay the fine imposed, the President is pleased to remit all of the sentence, except so much thereof as directs cashiering, which will be duly executed.

"WM. W. BELKNAP, Secretary of War."

The said Secretary also issued, January 16, 1873, a General Order of the War Department No. 7, Series of 1873, announcing the sentence of the court martial, and that "Major Benjamin P. Runkle, U. S. Army (retired), ceases to be an officer of the Army from the date of [548] this order."

From the date of this order till after August 4, 1877, the claimant's name was not borne upon the Army Register.

V.

August 4, 1877, R. B. Hayes, President of the United States, made the following order:

"EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, August 4, 1877.

"In the Matter of the Application of Major Benjamin P. Runkle, U. S. Army (retired).

"The record of official action heretofore taken in the premises shows the following facts, to wit:

"First. That on the 14th of October, 1872, Major Runkle was found guilty by court martial upon the following charges, to wit:

"Charge 1. 'Violation of the Act of Congress approved March 2, 1863, chapter 67, section 1.'

"Charge 2. 'Conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman.'

"Second. That on the 16th of January, 1873, W. W. Belknap, then Secretary of War, approved the proceedings of said court, and thereupon caused General Order No. 7, Series of 1873, to issue from the War Department, by which it was announced that Major Benjamin P. Runkle was cashiered from the military service of the United States.

"Third. That subsequent to the date of said General Order No. 7, to wit, on the 16th day of January, 1873, Major Runkle presented to the President a petition, setting forth that the proceedings of said court had not been approved by the President of the United States, as required by law; that said conviction was unjust; that the record of said proceedings was not in form or substance sufficient in law to warrant the issuing of said order, and asking the revocation and annulment of the same.

"Fourth. That in pursuance of this petition, the record of the official action theretofore had in the premises was, by direction of the President, Ulysses S. Grant, referred to the Judge-Advocate-General of the United States Army for review and report.

[549] "Fifth. That thereupon the Judge-Advocate-General reviewed the case and made his report thereon, in which it is reported and determined, among other things, that in the proceedings had upon the trial of the case by said court, 'it is nowhere affirmatively established that he (Major Runkle) actually appropriated any money to his own use.'

"It also appears in said report that the conviction of said Runkle, upon charge one as aforesaid, is sustained upon the opinion that sufficient proof of the crime of embezzlement on the part of the accused was disclosed by the evidence before the court. And with respect to charge two, no reference to the same is made in said report, except to deny the sufficiency of the evidence in the case, for a conviction upon the fourteenth specification thereof; and it is to be observed that the thirteen remaining specifications under this charge are identical with the thirteen specifications under charge one.

"The Judge-Advocate-General further finds and determines in said report as follows, to wit: 'For alleged failures to pay, or to pay in full,' on the part of the subagents, 'I am of the opinion that the accused cannot justly be held liable.'

"Sixth. That no subsequent proceedings have been had with reference to said report, and that the said petition of said Runkle now awaits further and final action thereon.

"Whereupon, having caused the said record, together with said report, to be laid before me, and having carefully considered the same, I am of opinion that the said conviction is not sustained by the evidence in the case, and the same, together with the sentence of the court thereon, are hereby disapproved; and it is directed that said Order No. 7, so far as it relates to said Runkle, be revoked.

"R. B. HAYES."

At the time of the issue by President Hayes of this order, the number of officers on the retired list of the Army was 300, and continued so until November 19, 1877. During that period the claimant was carried on the Army records as additional to the number of retired officers allowed by law, until a vacancy occurred on said last named date; since which date he has been borne on the retired list, and up to January 1, 1884, has drawn pay to the [550] amount of $23,585.62. Of this sum $9,195.27 was paid to him August 15, 1877, for the period from January 16, 1873, the date of the order signed by Secretary Belknap, to the 4th of August, 1877, the date of the order of President Hayes.

VI.

August 7, 1877, the claimant addressed a letter to the Paymaster-General of the Army, asserting his legal right to pay as a retired major for the period of time between the dates of those two orders. This letter the Paymaster-General referred to the Secretary of War, with the following indorsement:

"Respectfully forwarded to the Hon. Secretary of War.

"It has been enjoined that questions of payment in such cases shall be submitted to the Secretary of War. See letter of July 7, 1863, from Col. J. A. Hardee, Asst. Adjt.-General, to the Paymaster-General, stating the orders of the War Department, that 'an officer restored to the service either by the revocation of the order of dismissal or discharge, or by simple restoration, is not entitled to pay for the period that he was out of service, unless the same is expressly ordered by the War Department.'

"The language of the Judge-Advocate-General on this point is to the same effect. (See Judge-Advocate's Digest of 1868, p. 266.) 'Where an order of the War Department for the dismissal, discharge, or muster out of an officer is subsequently revoked, and he reinstated in his former rank and position, it is competent for the President, in his discretion, to allow him pay for the interval during which he was illegally separated from the service under the original order.'

"The course of military administration has, however, developed no precise rule on this subject, each case of a claim for pay by such an officer having been, in practice, determined by the special circumstances surrounding it.

"BENJ. ALVORD,
"Paym'r-General U. S. Army.
"P. M. G. OFFICE, Aug. 9, 1877."

[551] The Secretary of War returned the letter to the Paymaster-General, through the Adjutant-General, and when it reached the Paymaster-General it had on it the following indorsements:

"Respectfully returned (through the Adjutant-General) to the Paymaster-General.

"By the order of the President, of Aug. 4, 1877, the approval of the proceedings and sentence in the case of Major B. P. Runkle, of date January 16, 1878, was revoked, the said proceedings and sentence were disapproved, and the order of dismissal was set aside.

"This order of the President must be accepted by this department as revoking said order of dismissal from its inception and as annulling all its consequences. As Major Runkle was at the time of his trial and sentence, an officer of the retired list, the fact that he has not been on duty in the interim can make no difference, since a retired officer is not subject to duty.

"He will, therefore, be paid, whenever funds are available for that purpose. This indorsement has been submitted to and is approved by the President.

"GEORGE W. MCCRARY,
"Secretary of War.
"WAR DEPT. Aug. 13, '77.

"Noted and respectfully forwarded.
"E. D. TOWNSEND,
"AUG. 14, '77. Adj't-Gen'l."

Upon receiving back the said letter with said indorsements, the Paymaster-General made thereon this indorsement:

"Respectfully referred to Major Alexander Sharp, P. M., U. S. A., Present. Maj. Runkle was last paid to include Jan. 15, 1878.

"CHAS. T. LARNED,
"Acting Paym'r-Gen'l U. S. Army.
"C. T. L., P. M. G. O., Aug. 15, 1877."

[552] It was in obedience to the order of the President, signified by the above indorsement of the Secretary of War, that the claimant was paid the aforesaid sum of $9,195.27.

Upon the foregoing facts the conclusions of law were as follows:

1. That the claimant is not entitled to recover longevity pay.

2. That the defendants are not entitled, under their counterclaim, to recover the pay received by the claimant as a retired major, which accrued after the 4th of August, 1877, amounting to $14,890.85.

3. That the defendants are entitled, under their counterclaim, to recover of the claimant $9,195.27, being the amount paid him for the time between January 16, 1878, and August 4, 1877. 19 Ct. Cl. 396.

From a judgment entered in accordance with these conclusions both parties appealed.

We will first consider the second of the questions referred to the court of claims; namely,

[554] "Were the proceedings and findings of said court martial regular and the sentence duly approved by the President of the United States, as required by law?" [555]

The 65th Article of War, 2 Stat. at L. 807, chap. 29, in force at the time of these proceedings, was as follows:

"Any general officer commanding an army, or colonel commanding a separate department, may appoint general courts martial, whenever necessary. But no sentence of a court martial shall be carried into execution until after the whole proceedings shall have been laid before the officer ordering the same, or the officer commanding the troops for the time being; neither shall any sentence of a general court martial, in the time of peace, extending to the loss of life, or the dismission of a commissioned officer, or which shall, either in time of peace or war, respect a general officer, be carried into execution, until after the whole proceedings shall have been transmitted to the Secretary of War, to be laid before the President of the United States, for his confirmation or disapproval, and orders in the case. All other sentences may be confirmed and executed by the officer ordering the court to assemble, or the commanding officer, for the time being, as the case may be."

Thus it appears that the sentence of a general court martial, in time of peace, to the effect that a commissioned officer be cashiered—dismissed from service—is inoperative until approved by the President. Before then it is interlocutory and inchoate only. Mills v. Martin, 19 Johns. 7, 30; Simmons, Court Martial, 6th ed. chap. XVII, p. 294.

A court martial organized under the laws of the United States is a court of special and limited jurisdiction. It is called into existence for a special purpose and to perform a particular duty. When the object of its creation has been accomplished it is dissolved. 3 Greenl. Ev. [556] § 470; Brooks v. Adams, 11 Pick. 442; Mills v. Martin, supra; Duffield v. Smith, 3 Serg. & R. 590, 599. Such also is the effect of the decision of this court in Wise v. Withers, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch, 331 [2: 457]; which, according to the interpretation given it by Chief Justice Marshall in Ex parte Watkins, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 193, 207 [7: 894, 899], ranked a court martial as "one of those inferior courts of limited jurisdiction whose judgments may be questioned collaterally." To give effect to its sentences it must appear affirmatively and unequivocally that the court was legally constituted; that it had jurisdiction; that all the statutory regulations governing its proceedings had been complied with, and that its sentence was conformable to law. Dynes v. Hoover, 61 U. S. 20 How. 65, 80 [15: 838, 844]; Mills v. Martin, 19 Johns. 33. There are no presumptions in its favor so far as these matters are concerned. As to them, the rule announced by Chief Justice Marshall in Brown v. Keene, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 115 [8: 886], in respect to averments of jurisdiction in the courts of the United States applies. His language is: "The decisions of this court require that averment of jurisdiction shall be positive—that the declaration shall state expressly the facts on which jurisdiction depends. It is not sufficient that jurisdiction may be inferred, argumentatively, from its averments." All this is equally true of the proceedings of courts martial. Their authority is statutory, and the statute under which they proceed must be followed throughout. The facts necessary to show their jurisdiction and that their sentences were conformable to law must be stated positively; and it is not enough that they may be inferred argumentatively.

As the sentence now under consideration involved the dismissal of Runkle from the Army, it could not become operative until approved by the President, after the whole proceedings of the court martial had been laid before him. The important question is, therefore, whether that approval has been positively shown.

The court of claims has found as a fact in the case that the "proceedings, findings, and sentence of said court martial were transmitted to the Secretary of War," but it has not found [557] that they were laid before the President, or acted on by him, otherwise than may be inferred argumentatively from the orders of the Secretary of War, and the subsequent action of President Grant and President Hayes.

There can be no doubt that the President, in the exercise of his executive power under the Constitution, may act through the head of the appropriate executive department. The heads of departments are his authorized assistants in the performance of his executive duties, and their official acts, promulgated in the regular course of business, are presumptively his acts. That has been many times decided by this court. Wilcox v. Jackson, 38 U. S. 18 Pet. 498, 513 [10: 264, 271]; U. S. v. Eliason, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 291, 302 [10: 968, 972]; Confiscation Cases, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 92, 109 [22: 320, 323]; U. S. v. Farden, 99 U. S. 10, 19 [25: 267, 269]; Wolsey v. Chapman, 101 U. S. 755, 769 [25: 915, 920].

Here, however, the action required of the President is judicial in its character, not administrative. As Commander in Chief of the Army he has been made by law the person whose duty it is to review the proceedings of courts martial in cases of this kind. This implies that he is himself to consider the proceedings laid before him and decide personally whether they ought to be carried into effect. Such a power he cannot delegate. His personal judgment is required, as much so as it would have been in passing on the case, if he had been one of the members of the court martial itself. He may call others to his assistance in making his examinations and in informing himself as to what ought to be done; but his judgment, when pronounced, must be his own judgment and not that of another. And this because he is the person, and the only person, to whom has been committed the important judicial power of finally determining upon an examination of the whole proceedings of a court martial, whether an officer holding a commission in the Army of the United States shall be dismissed from service as a punishment for an offense with which he has been charged, and for which he has been tried. In this connection the following remarks of Attorney-General Bates, in an opinion furnished President Lincoln, under date of March 12, 1864 (11 Ops. Attys-Gen. 21), are appropriate:

[558] "Undoubtedly the President, in passing upon the sentence of a court martial, and giving to it the approval without which it cannot be executed, acts judicially. The whole proceeding from its inception is judicial. The trial, finding, and sentence, are the solemn acts of a court organized and conducted under the authority of and according to the prescribed forms of law. It sits to pass upon the most sacred questions of human rights that are ever placed on trial in a court of justice; rights which, in the very nature of things, can neither be exposed to danger nor subjected to the uncontrolled will of any man, but which must be adjudged according to law. And the act of the officer who reviews the proceedings of the court, whether he be the commander of the fleet or the President, and without whose approval the sentence cannot be executed, is as much a part of this judgment, according to law, as is the trial or the sentence. When the President, then, performs this duty of approving the sentence of a court martial dismissing an officer, his act has all the solemnity and significance of the judgment of a court of law."

We go, then, to the record to see whether it shows positively and distinctly that the sentence dismissing Runkle from the service was approved by President Grant. It does appear affirmatively that it was disapproved by President Hayes; and if not approved by President Grant, Runkle was never legally out of the service. It is true that, if it had been approved, the subsequent disapproval would have been a nullity, and could not have the effect of restoring him to his place; but if not approved, he was never out, and the disapproval kept him in, the same as if the court martial had never been convened for his trial. In Blake v. United States, 103 U. S. 227 [26:462], followed in United States v. Tyler, 105 U. S. 244 [26: 985], it was decided that the President had power to supersede or remove an officer of the Army by the appointment, by and with the consent of the Senate, of his successor; but here there was nothing of that kind. Runkle was never removed, otherwise than by the sentence of the court martial, and the order of the War Department purporting to give it effect.

Coming then to the order on which reliance is had to show the approval of President Grant, [559] we find it capable of division into two separate parts; one relating to the approval of the proceedings and sentence, and the other to the executive clemency which was invoked and exercised. It is signed by the Secretary of War alone, and the personal action of the President in the matter is nowhere mentioned, except in the remission of a part of the sentence. There is nothing which can have the effect of an affirmative statement that "the whole proceedings" had been laid before him for action, or that he personally approved the sentence. The facts found by the court of claims show that the proceedings, findings, and sentence of the court martial "were transmitted to the Secretary of War, and that he wrote the order thereon," but there they stop. What he wrote is in the usual form of departmental orders, and, so far as it relates to the approval of the sentence, indicates on its face departmental action only.

What follows in the order does not, to say the least, clearly show the contrary. It relates to the executive clemency which was exercised, and then, for the first and only time, it appears, in express terms, that the President acted per sonally in the matter. It is there said: "The President is pleased to remit all of the sentence, except so much thereof as directs cashiering." If all the rest of the order was the result of the personal action of the President, why was it referred to here and not elsewhere? Might it not fairly be argued from this that the rest was deemed departmental business, and that part alone personal which required the exercise of the personal power of the President, under the Constitution, of granting pardons. And besides, according to the order as it stands, this action of the President was had, not on "the whole proceedings," but "in view of the unanimous recommendation of the members of the court," "the former good character" of the accused, and "in consideration of evidence, by affidavits, presented to the War Department since the trial," and "credible representations." If "the whole proceedings" had actually been laid before him, as required by the article of War, it was easy to say so.

[560] Then, again, at the end of the order are these words, "which [the sentence] will be duly executed." That which immediately preceded related to the remission of a part of the sentence, and the Secretary was careful to say that this was done by the President in person. The omission of any such language, or implication even, in the words which were added, leaves the order open to the construction that the Secretary was acting all the time on the idea that the personal judgment of the President was required only in reference to that part of the proceeding which involved the exercise of the pardoning power, and that the rest belonged to the Department.

Still further, it appears, from the order of President Hayes, that "the record of official action" showed that "on the 16th of January, 1873, W. W. Belknap, then Secretary of War, approved the proceedings of said court," and thereupon issued the order from the War Department announcing that Runkle was cashiered, and that after this order was issued, but on the same day, Runkle presented to President Grant a petition setting forth, among other things, "that the proceedings of said court had not been approved by the President of the United States as required by law." This petition was not only received by President Grant, but it was by him referred to the Judge-Advocate-General for "review and report." Upon this reference the Judge-Advocate-General acted and reported on the whole case. President Grant did nothing further in the premises, and the matter remained open when President Hayes came into office. He then took it up as unfinished business, and, acting as though the proceedings had never been approved, entered an order of disapproval.

Under these circumstances, we cannot say it positively and distinctly appears that the proceedings of the court martial have ever in fact been approved or confirmed in whole or in part by the President of the United States, as the Articles of War required, before the sentence could be carried into execution. Consequently, Major Runkle was never legally cashiered or dismissed from the Army, and he is entitled to his longevity pay, as well as that which he has already received for his regular pay, both before the order of Secretary Belknap was revoked and afterwards.

Such being our view of the case, it is unnecessary to consider any of the other questions [561] which were referred to the court of claims. Neither do we decide what the precise form of an order of the President approving the proceedings and sentence of a court martial should be; nor that his own signature must be affixed thereto. But we are clearly of opinion that it will not be sufficient unless it is authenticated in a way to show otherwise than argumentatively that it is the result of the judgment of the President himself, and that it is not a mere departmental order which might or might not have attracted his personal attention. The fact that the order was his own should not be left to inference only.

The judgment of the Court of Claims is reversed and the cause remanded, for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

Sales—express warranty—creation of—affirmation of quality or condition—action of tort for breach of an express warranty in municipal bonds—deceit—pleading—scienter—erroneous instruction.

1. Where the seller makes an affirmation of the quality or condition of the thing sold, other than as matter of opinion or belief, at the time of sale, for the purpose of assuring the buyer of the truth of the facts affirmed, and inducing him to make the purchase, such affirmation, if so received and relied on by the purchaser, is an express warranty.

2. In an action to recover damages for the sale of municipal bonds to the plaintiff, alleged to have been forgeries, it is held: that the original complaint made a case in tort for the breach of an express warranty in the sale of the municipal bonds; that said cause of action in tort was not obliterated, or removed from the case, because it was joined with a cause of action for deceit; that no particular phraseology or form of words is necessary to create a warranty of the character claimed; that it was error to instruct the jury that the plaintiff could not recover unless he established the scienter upon the part of the defendant; and that the plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury upon the issue of express warranty as to the genuineness of the bonds and coupons in question.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado. Reported below, 4 McCrary, 59. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. George E. Adams and J. M. Holmes, for plaintiff in error:

The rule is well settled that when a party sells, for a valuable consideration, forged paper, the injured party has two remedies: one ex contractu, the other an action on the case for deceit.

It is equally well settled that in an action on the case for deceit no scienter need be alleged, nor if alleged need it be proved.

A vendor by the mere act of selling bonds, notes, etc., without anything more, warrants the title thereto, and the genuineness of the signatures.

Terry v. Bissell, 26 Conn. 40; Shaver v. Ehle, 16 Johns. 201; Canal Bank v. Bank of Albany, 1 Hill, 287; Aldrich v. Jackson, 5 R. I. 218; Webb v. Odell, 49 N. Y. 583; Litchfield v. Hutchinson, 117 Mass. 195.

It is also undisputed law that an action on the case in tort, for deceit, will lie for a breach of the implied warranty.

Schuchardt v. Allens, supra; Williamson v. Allison, 2 East, 446; Adamson v. Jarvis, 4 Bing. 73; S. C. 12 Moore, 241; Cooley, Torts, 500.

Our position is that a vendor, by the mere act of sale, affirms, as well as warrants, the genuineness of the signatures; that it is immaterial whether the action is brought upon a false warranty or upon the false representation. The same fact will sustain an action upon either. That an implied warranty without an implied representation is an impossibility. That by the mere fact of offering for sale bonds in his possession, the vendor not only warrants the genuineness of the signatures but distinctly affirms their genuineness; that the implied warranty is a deduction from the antecedent representation. That the vendor, having represented the signatures to be genuine, is held to have thereby warranted them to be genuine. That an implied representation is as binding upon the vendor as an express representation, and that by the mere act of offering bonds or notes for sale the vendor affirms the genuineness of the signatures as fully as he would affirm by an express verbal representation.

Mr. G. G. Symes, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error brings up for review a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado, in an action brought by the plaintiff in error to recover damages for the delivery to him of certain sheets of [576] written and printed paper, purporting to be the valid and genuine bonds, with interest coupons attached, of the County of Clark, in the State of Arkansas, issued under and in accordance with the provisions of an Act of the General Assembly of that State, approved April 29, 1873, entitled "An Act to Authorize Certain Counties to Fund Their Outstanding Indebtedness;" but which instruments, it is alleged, were "false and spurious forgeries," imposing no legal obligation whatever upon said county. The plaintiff alleges that, in consideration of a certain sum paid by him in cash to the defendant, the latter sold and agreed forthwith to deliver to him valid and genuine bonds of said county, of the above description, but delivered the said spurious and forged bonds in execution of the terms of such sale and agreement; that the defendant, at the time of such delivery, "falsely and fraudulently represented and warranted" said forged bonds "to be genuine and valid bonds and interest coupons of said county;" that the plaintiff, "relying on such representation and warranty, received and accepted the same from defendant, supposing them to be such genuine and valid bonds and interest coupons;" and that, "by said tortious and wrongful act and fraudulent breaches of said agreement and warranty of genuineness, done and committed by defendant in the delivery by him as aforesaid of such spurious, forged and altered instruments, the plaintiff has been subjected to great loss and damage," etc.

The defendant denies that the bonds and coupons delivered by him were spurious or forged, and avers that they were, in law, genuine, valid obligations of the County of Clark, and were delivered by him in the belief that they were of that character. He also denies that "he ever, at any time, expressly or by implication, warranted said bonds and coupons so sold and delivered by him to plaintiff to be genuine bonds and coupons of said County of Clark." He avers that the plaintiff purchased and received them "at his own risk as to the validity and genuineness thereof, and without any warranty on the part of defendant, express or implied, against such defects or infirmities in said bonds and coupons."

The original complaint and answer contain [577] other allegations; but it is not necessary, in the view we take of the case, to set them out.

The plaintiff amended his complaint, adding all the allegations which are essential, under any system of pleading, to support an action for deceit. These allegations were traversed by the defendant, and, upon a trial before a jury, there was a verdict and judgment in his favor.

The bill of exceptions states that the plaintiff, to sustain the issues on his part, introduced evidence tending to show that at the date mentioned in the complaint defendant sold to him, for $8,000, ninety-one sheets of paper purporting to be Clark County, Arkansas, funding bonds; that said sheets of paper were forgeries, and not genuine bonds, as they purported on their face to be; that defendant, at the time of sale, expressly affirmed their regularity and validity, although he knew, or had reason to suspect, at the time, that they were not genuine and valid; that plaintiff believed and supposed that they were genuine and valid, and relied upon defendant's representations to that effect; and that plaintiff had no notice or knowledge that defendant was acting in said sale as agent for another person.

The defendant introduced evidence tending to show that said papers were genuine and valid Clark County, Arkansas, funding bonds; that at the time of the sale he made no statement, representation or warranty as to their genuineness or validity, but on the contrary stated that he knew nothing of the circumstances under which they were issued; that he had neither notice nor knowledge of any want of validity or of any defects in said bonds, nor notice of any facts which would have aroused suspicion in reference to them; that, in the sale of said bonds to plaintiff, he was acting as the agent of Charles W. Tankersley, from whom he had received the bonds shortly before their sale, but did not at the time disclose to plaintiff his agency."

The court charged the jury that, upon the facts conceded before them, the bonds, by reason of certain unauthorized alterations of the coupons, were not valid and genuine obligations of the County of Clark. The jury were also [578] instructed that whoever sells such instruments as those delivered to the plaintiff, "if nothing whatever be said in respect to their character, by the act of selling warrants them to be the genuine obligations of the county; that is, that they are not forged or counterfeited, but are the true and proper obligations of the county, such as they purported to be on their face; and upon an action for breach of warranty, or an action upon the contract, the defendant would undoubtedly, beyond all question, be liable for the amount which he received for the bonds; * * * but this action is not of that character, that is, it is not an action upon the contract alone. As I said to you in the outset, it is an action for a false representation, or for a misrepresentation, of fact, and there must be something more to maintain this action than the implied warranty which arises from the act of selling, and which is an inference of law coming from the act of selling." The court said further upon the subject of warranty: "It is not claimed that there were any direct representations in respect to the genuineness of those bonds made at the time of the sale thereof, except in this way: I think Mr. Shippen states that the defendant said he would warrant the title to the bonds. I will not undertake to repeat what the witnesses said in respect to that matter; the only witnesses were the parties to the suit, I believe, as to what was stated at the time." Without giving more of the charge, it is sufficient to say that its scope is indicated by the circuit judge in the opinion delivered by him when denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial. He said: "The complainant charges that, to induce plaintiff to purchase certain bonds, the defendant represented that they were genuine and valid bonds; whereas, in truth and in fact, they were worthless forgeries. The court charged the jury that it was necessary for plaintiff to show that the defendant, at the time of the sale of the bonds to the plaintiff, misrepresented the facts concerning their genuiness. In other words, the court was of the opinion, and so charged the jury, that plaintiff could not recover in this action by merely proving a sale of the bonds to him by defendants [579] and that the bonds were forgeries. It was held to be necessary to prove knowledge on the part of the defendant of the forged character of the bonds, or an express misrepresentation concerning the fact of their genuineness. The counsel for plaintiff insists that in such a case as this no scienter need be alleged, nor if alleged need be proved. I am unable to concur in the soundness of this proposition."

We are of opinion that it was error to instruct the jury that the plaintiff could not recover, in the present action, unless he established the scienter upon the part of the defendant. The original complaint—though, perhaps, not in the most concise language—made a case in tort for the breach of an express warranty in the sale of the bonds. The bill of exceptions states that the evidence, in behalf of the plaintiff, tended to show that, although the defendant knew or had reason to suspect, when the bonds were sold, that they were not genuine and valid, he "expressly affirmed their regularity and validity." These words may not necessarily import an express warranty. But no particular phraseology or form of words is necessary to create a warranty of that character. As was held by the Court of Appeals of Maryland, in Osgood v. Lewis, 2 Harr. & G. 495, 518, "An affirmation of the quality or condition of the thing sold (not uttered as matter of opinion or belief), made by the seller at the time of sale, for the purpose of assuring the buyer of the truth of the facts affirmed, and inducing him to make the purchase, if so received and relied on by the purchaser, is an express warranty. And in case of oral contracts, on the existence of these necessary ingredients to such a warranty, it is the province of the jury to decide, upon considering all the circumstances attending the transaction." To the same effect are Henshaw v. Robins, 9 Met. 83, 88; Oneida etc. Soc. v. Lawrence, 4 Cow. 440; Cook v. Moseley, 13 Wend. 278; Chapman v. Murch, 19 Johns. 290; Hawkins v. Berry, 5 Gilm. 36; McGregor v. Penn, 9 Yerg. 76, 77; Otto v. Alderson, 10 Smedes & M. 476. The plaintiff was clearly [582] entitled to go to the jury on the issue as to an express warranty. But he was, in effect, denied that right by the instruction that he could not recover in this action, unless he proved a scienter. It is true his pleadings also contained every allegation essential to support an action for deceit, apart from the issue as to express warranty. But the cause of action in tort for the breach of the express warranty was not obliterated, or removed from the case, because it was joined with a cause of action for deceit. In Schuchardt v. Allens, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 359, 368, [17: 642, 645], which was an action on the case for a false warranty on the sale of certain goods —the declaration also containing a count for deceit—the court said that it was now well settled, both in English and American jurisprudence, that either case or assumpsit would lie for a false warranty, and that, "Whether the declaration be in assumpsit or tort, it need not aver a scienter; and if the averment be made, it need not be proved." It was also said that, "If the declaration be in tort, counts for deceit may be added to the special counts, and a recovery may be had for the false warranty or for the deceit, according to the proof. Either will sustain the action." See also Dushane v. Benedict, 120 U. S. 636 [ante, 810]. In 1 Chitty's Pleadings, 187, the author says that case or assumpsit may be supported for a false warranty on the sale of goods, and that, "In an action upon the case in tort for a breach of a warranty of goods, the scienter need not be laid in the declaration, nor, if charged, could it be proved." In Lassiter v. Ward, 11 Ired. 444, Ruffin, C. J., citing Stuart v. Wilkins, 1 Doug. 18, and Williamson v. Allison, 2 East, 446, said: "It was accordingly there held that the declaration might be in tort, without alleging a scienter, and if it be alleged in addition to the warranty, that it need not be proved. The doctrine of the case is that, when there is a warranty, that is the gist of the action, and that it is only when there is no warranty that a scienter need be alleged or proved. It is nearly a half century since the decision, and during that period the point has been considered at rest, and many actions have been brought in tort, as well as ex contractu, on false warranties." And so in House v. Fort, 4 Blackf. 293-4, it was said that [583] "The breach of an express warranty is of itself a valid ground of action, whether the suit be founded on tort or on contract;" and that, "In the action on tort, the forms of the declaration are, that the defendant falsely and fraudulently warranted, etc., but the words falsely and fraudulently, in such cases, are considered as only matters of form." But as to the scienter, the court said, "that is not necessary to be laid, when there is a warranty, though the action be in tort; or, if the scienter be laid, in such a case, there is no necessity of proving it." See also Hillman v. Wilcox, 30 Me. 170; Osgood v. Lewis, 2 Harr. & G. 495, 520; Trice v. Cockran, 8 Gratt. 450; Gresham v. Postan, 2 Car. & P. 540.

As the evidence entitled the plaintiff to go to the jury upon the issue of express warranty as to the genuiness of the bonds and coupons, and as the jury were in effect instructed that he could not recover, unless upon allegation and proof of the scienter, the judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded, with instructions to set aside the judgment and grant a new trial.

THE STEAMSHIP HESPER AND CARGO; GEORGE HORSELEY, Claimant, ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 256-267.)

Admiralty—libel to recover for salvage services—what is salvage service of lowest grade—jurisdiction of this court—review of matters of law only—inadequate or excessive decree—trial de novo on appeal from district court.

1. A salvage service which does not involve risk of property, peril of life or limb, unusual expense, gallantry, courage or heroism, is a salvage service of the lowest grade.

2. This court may, in cases of salvage as in other admiralty cases, revise the decree appealed from for matter of law, only; and it should not alter the decree for the reason that the amount awarded appears to be inadequate or excessive, unless the difference is so great that, upon any reasonable view of the facts found, the award cannot be justified by the rules of law applicable to the case.

3. An appeal in admiralty from the district court to the circuit court vacates altogether the decree of the former and the case is tried de novo in the circuit court. The award of the district court in favor of the appellant may be decreased on appeal, although the appellee did not appeal.

Argued May 6, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Texas. Opinion below, 18 Fed. Rep. 696. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Eppa Hunton, for appellants:

"Courts of admiralty usually consider the following circumstances as the main ingredients in determining the amount of the reward to be decreed for salvage service:

(1) The labor expended by the salvors in rendering salvage service.

(2) The promptitude, skill, and energy displayed in rendering the service and saving the property.

(3) The value of the property employed by the salvors and the danger to which it was exposed.

(4) The risk incurred by the salvors in securing the property from impending peril.

(5) The value of the property saved.

(6) The degree of danger from which the property was rescued."

The Blackwall, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 18 (19: 874).

It will be found that every one of these circumstances formed ingredients in this case.

The risk was that of wrecking the lighter and steam tug, at the possible risk of life. Risk of life is not a necessary ingredient, but it places the salvors in a higher position of merit and entitles them to a more liberal compensation.

Spencer v. The Charles Avery, 1 Bond. 119; The William Beckford, 3 C. Rob. 355; The Emulous, 1 Sumn. 214; Tyson v. Prior, 1 Gall. 133; The Henry Eubank, 1 Sumn. 400; Bearse v. 340 Pigs of Copper, 1 Story, 326; Mason v. The Blaireau, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 240 (2: 266).

Mr. John H. Thomas, for appellees:

Both of the appellants' tugs were employed by the agent of The Hesper, and sent to her assistance. Their right to compensation was not like that of ordinary salvors, contingent on success. They were entitled to compensation for the time and labor they might expend, whether their operations should be successful or otherwise.

Even if their right to compensation had been contingent on success, a proper measure of award would have been the amount for which such service would probably have been undertaken, for compensation dependent upon such contingency.

The award of $4,200 is 4½ percent of $100,000, the value of The Hesper. The amount and percentage are both large in comparison with the awards made by the best admiralty courts in this country and England, even to passenger and freight steamers, where human life as well as property was saved, taking into account the duration and character of the services.

The circuit court, on appeals in admiralty, takes up the case de novo. It cannot, like other appellate courts, simply affirm or reverse the decree appealed from. It must render its own decree, as the whole testimony before it may render proper. There was no impropriety, therefore, in the circuit court decreeing for a smaller amount than that decreed for by the district court.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a libel in rem, in admiralty, brought in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Texas, by Robert Irvine and Charles L. Beissner, owners of the steam lighter Buckthorn and the steam tug Estelle, against the steamship Hesper, in a cause of salvage.

The libel sets forth salvage services rendered to the Hesper by the Buckthorn and the Estelle, in pulling her off from the shore, at Galveston Island, about twenty-five miles from Galveston, Texas, where she had grounded on her voyage from Liverpool to Galveston, with a cargo of salt, in December, 1882.

The answer of the owners of the Hesper avers their readiness to pay a reasonable compensation for the services actually rendered by [257] the two vessels, but denies that more than compensation for actual services and time is due, and denies that the services rendered were salvage services.

Proofs were taken, and the district court, in April, 1883 (18 Fed. Rep. 692), made a decree adjudging that the libelants were entitled to compensation in the nature of salvage, for the saving of the Hesper and her cargo, and allowing to the libelants, for the services of each of the two vessels, $3,000, and to the owners of the schooner Mary E. Clark, and men who had been employed to load upon her part of the cargo of the Hesper, and to jettison such cargo, $2,000; and, the claims of the owners of that schooner and of those men having been settled by the Hesper, it was ordered that the $2,000 should go to the Hesper.

Both parties gave notice of appeal from this decree to the circuit court. The libelants perfected their appeal, but the claimants of the Hesper did not perfect theirs. Some further proof was taken in the circuit court, and, on the 13th of November, 1883, that court, having heard the cause, filed the following findings of fact and conclusions of law:

"This cause came on to be heard on the transcript and evidence, and was argued. Whereupon, the court, being advised of the evidence, finds the following as the facts of the case:

"1. That, about 5.45, A. M., of the 12th day of December, A. D. 1882, the steamship Hesper, bound on a voyage from Liverpool to Galveston, being out of her course, ran aground at the southwest side of Galveston Island, about twenty miles southwest from Galveston, and nearly opposite the life saving station. The Hesper was an iron propeller, and built in Hartlepool, in England, 1881, at a cost of twenty-two thousand pounds; her registered tonnage is, gross, 1,654 tons; net, 1,069 tons. Her freight capacity is 1,950 tons. She has powerful engines of 750 horse power, with steam windlasses and winches, and on said 12th of December was well found and well manned in every respect. She was laden with a cargo of about 900 tons of salt.

"2. That, when the Hesper went ashore, her engines were slowed down and she was making about four knots per hour. She struck easily without shock and remained upright. Her draft was then thirteen feet nine inches. The sea was smooth and there was very little wind; what there was was from the south, and the ship headed, when she struck, northeast by north. Kedge anchors were immediately put out to the east southeast, and efforts made to get the ship off in that direction, with the ship's engines heaving on those anchors. At the same time, a message was sent overland to Galveston, [258] the nearest port, to the ship's agent, to send assistance.

"3. That the agent of the ship applied to the agent of the tug Estelle, and procured that tug to go to the assistance of the Hesper. The Estelle was a long, narrow, deep boat, drawing about eight feet eight inches, and was the most powerful towboat in Galveston Harbor, and had aboard the usual appliances of such boats. The Estelle reached the Hesper about 5 P. M. of the 12th of December and reported. The master of the Hesper endeavored to bargain with the master of the Estelle as to the cost of pulling the Hesper off, but the master of the Estelle refused to make any agreement, on the ground that he did not know how much labor and time it would take. A line was then given the Estelle, from the stern of the Hesper, which was then more off the shore than the bow, and the Estelle hauled on said line for about two hours, during which time the crew of the Hesper, with some four or five hands from the life saving station, were throwing over cargo. No appreciable result came from this towing of the Estelle, and she desisted on the orders of the master of the Hesper.

"4. That, in the meantime, the sea, which had been smooth, with very little swell, had become more turbulent, and there was a very decided increase in the ground swell from the southeast. No so much, however, but that small boats were flying around the Hesper, and life-boats were running easily to and from shore. At this time of stopping hauling by the Estelle the master of the Hesper requested the Estelle to come alongside and run a heavy anchor out seaward from the Hesper, both to keep the Hesper from drifting further in, and for the Hesper to heave on to pull herself off. This the master of the Estelle refused to do, on the ground that there was too much sea on, and that he would thereby endanger his own boat, and thereupon the Estelle, taking aboard the Hesper's agent, who had come overland, proceeded back to Galveston, to procure more assistance. It was then found that the Estelle was making some water from a leak caused by a defect in the staff of the stuffing box, which was not tight enough, and was worked loose [259] by the strain in hauling on the Hesper. However, the Estelle proceeded that night (of the 12th) to Galveston Bar, where she laid until morning, reaching Galveston wharves about noon of the 13th of December. The Estelle lay at the wharves repairing until the morning of the 14th of December, when she took the schooner Clark, which had been engaged by the Hesper's agent to lighter cargo, in tow, and towed her down to the Hesper.

"5. That, on the 13th of December, the ship Hesper was lively, though still aground, shifting her position slightly, but not affecting her safety, some 450 tons of water having been pumped into her ballast tanks to put her down and keep her from going nearer in shore, and her crew being engaged in throwing over cargo, while waiting for assistance. And, on the same day, the agent engaged the Buckthorn, a steam lighter, belonging to libelants, of lighter draft and power than the Estelle, to proceed to the Hesper, which she did, taking down a heavy anchor and cables, and two new hawsers (the latter purchased by the Hesper's agent), and a gang of men employed by the Hesper's agent, to help lighter the cargo and generally assist, and also provisions and other necessaries, arriving in the night and lying by until morning.

"6. That, on the morning of the 14th of December, the position and condition of the Hesper was much the same as on the preceding day, the weather being calm and the sea smooth. About nine o'clock in the morning, the gang of men brought down by the Buckthorn, after breakfasting aboard the Hesper, commenced to jettison cargo, and the Buckthorn carried out seaward and dropped the heavy anchor brought down from Galveston in about 18 feet of water connecting the same, by hawsers and cables of about 210 fathoms in length, with the steam winch of the Hesper. The Buckthorn then also took a line from the Hesper, and pulled on her, while the machinery of the Hesper was heaving on the hawsers leading to the heavy anchors, but no relief was given. Towards noon on the 14th the Estelle arrived, with the Clark in tow. The Clark was placed alongside of the Hesper, and cargo was transferred to her by the crew and the gang aforesaid. This [260] lightering was kept up until about four o'clock in the afternoon, when about one third of the cargo was removed, and nearly all the ballast water pumped out, and then the Estelle took a line from the Buckthorn, and a general effort was made by the Buckthorn, the Estelle, and the Hesper's engines, to get the Hesper off, which succeeded, whereupon the Hesper, which was uninjured, steamed to Galveston.

"7. Where the Hesper went aground, the slope of the ground seaward is gradual, and the bottom is sand.

"8. The prevailing and probable winds on that shore, during the month of December, are from the south and southeast, sometimes of great violence.

"9. During the three days the Hesper was aground, there was no wind nor sea of any danger to ships, large or small, and the services rendered to the Hesper, aiding her to get safely off, were not attended with any hazard or danger, or any circumstances unusual to the towage and lighterage business, as carried on in Galveston Roads, when the wind is moderate and the sea smooth.

"10. That the value of the Hesper, which was entirely uninjured by going ashore, was $100,000 and the value of her cargo saved was $6,500. The value of libelants' two boats, the tug Estelle and the lighter Buckthorn, was $35,000.

"11. That the Hesper, when aground as aforesaid, was in a condition of peril and distress, hardly likely to be able to get out of danger by her own efforts, even if the weather had been certain to continue favorable for many days, and certain to be wrecked if the weather should prove to be had.

"12. That the services rendered the Hesper by the libelants' boats, the Estelle and Buckthorn, were salvage services, but of the lowest grade, involving neither risk of property, peril of life or limb, nor unusual expense, nor gallantry, courage, or heroism, and the same will be fully compensated by double compensation, on the basis of towage and lighterage services.

"13. The Estelle was engaged in these services three days and one night, and the Buck-[261] thorn two days and one night. The outside earnings of either of these boats, with their appliances, is $300 per day, which, allowing as much for night work, would make the sum of $2,100 compensation, and double compensation is the sum of $4,200.

"And the court finds the following as conclusions of law:

"1. The services rendered by the libelants' boats, the Estelle and the Buckthorn, and their respective masters and crews, were salvage services of the lowest grade.

"2. That the court should award for said services the sum of $4,200.

"3. That libelants should have judgment for the sum of $4,200, and costs incurred in the district court.

"4. That the libelants should pay the costs of this court."

Thereupon, a decree was made by the circuit court in favor of the libelants, for $4,200 and the costs of both courts. 18 Fed. Rep. 696. From this decree the libelants have appealed to this court. Their notice of appeal states that they claimed, as their compensation for the salvage services to the vessel and cargo, one fourth of the sum of $106,500, found by the circuit court as the value of the Hesper and her cargo.

It is assigned for error that the circuit court erred in deciding that the services rendered by the Estelle and the Buckthorn were salvage services of the lowest grade. This is found by the circuit court both as a conclusion of fact and a conclusion of law. Regarding it as a conclusion of fact, it is not reviewable here. Regarding it as a conclusion of law, it is based upon the finding of fact that the salvage services involved "neither risk of property, peril of life or limb, nor unusual expense, nor gallantry, courage or heroism." The Estelle having been engaged in the services three days and one night, and the Buckthorn two days and one night, the court, treating the whole service as a service for seven days, and finding that the outside earnings of either of the boats, with its appliances, was $300 per day, being $2,100 for seven days, doubled the compensa-[265] tion, and made it $4,200, stating that that would be a full compensation, on the basis of towage and lighterage services.

The circuit court, in its opinion (18 Fed. Rep. 698), says: "Proctor for respondents in this case admits in argument, that, by reason of the service of the extra anchor furnished by the libelants, the service amounts to salvage service. But for this admission I have grave doubts whether I could have found as a fact that the services ranked above towage and lighterage service, to be compensated on the principle of a quantum meruit. But salvage services being taken as established, the question is one solely of amount. As a fact in the case, I have found that there was neither risk of property, peril of life or limb, nor unusual expense, nor gallantry, courage or heroism. The evidence shows there was no enterprise in going out in tempestuous weather, as the weather was moderate and the libelants' tug only went out when called upon and employed so to do. The labor and skill furnished were of the ordinary kind, such as libelants' boats were seeking as ordinary employment. Salvage, then, is to be determined entirely by the distress in which the salved property was. The distress of the Hesper was the salvors' opportunity, and the amount of salvage, on this point, determines the whole case."

The principle upon which the circuit court proceeded, as stated in its opinion, was that, although storms might have come which would have destroyed the Hesper, the services actually rendered to her by the tug and the lighter were ordinary services, and that if storms had come, the tug and the lighter might easily have sought safety.

We recently had occasion to fully consider the question of salvage in the case of The Connemara, 108 U. S. 352 [27: 751], where it was contended that the facts found by the circuit court did not constitute salvage service, and that, if a salvage service, it was salvage of the lowest grade, and the amount allowed was exorbitant. Holding the services to have been salvage services, this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Gray, said, 359 [753]: "The amount of salvage to be awarded, although stated by the circuit court in the form of a conclusion of [266] law, is largely a matter of fact and discretion, which cannot be reduced to precise rules, but depends upon a consideration of all the circumstances of each case." It is further there said, that, by the uniform course of decision in this court, during the period in which it had jurisdiction to reverse decrees in admiralty upon both facts and law, the amount decreed below was never reduced unless for some violation of just principles, or for clear and palpable mistake, or gross over allowance; and that, since the Act of Congress of February 16, 1875, chap. 77, restricting the appellate power of this court within narrower bounds, and limiting its authority to revise any decree in admiralty of the circuit court to questions of law, this court may, in cases of salvage as in other admiralty cases, "revise the decree appealed from for matter of law, but for matter of law only; and should not alter the decree for the reason that the amount awarded appears to be too large, unless the excess is so great that, upon any reasonable view of the facts found, the award cannot be justified by the rules of law applicable to the case." The decree appealed from in that case was affirmed, upon the ground that this court could not say, upon the findings of facts, that the amount awarded was so excessive as to violate any rule of law. The same principle was applied in The Tornado, 109 U. S. 110, 115 [27: 874, 876].

These views are equally sound in the case of an alleged under allowance. We cannot say, from the facts found in the case at bar, that the circuit court did not properly exercise its discretion in making the allowance it did, even though that amount was less than the amount allowed by the district court.

The claimants not having appealed to the circuit court, it is suggested that they are liable for at least the amount awarded by the district court, and that the circuit court could not reduce that amount, but had jurisdiction, on the actual appeal, only to increase it. It is well settled, however, that an appeal in admiralty from the district court to the circuit court vacates altogether the decree of the district court, and that the case is tried de novo in the circuit court. Yeaton v. U. S. 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 281 [3: 101]; Anon. 1 Gall. 22; The Roarer, 1 Blatchf. 1; The Saratoga v. 438 Bales of Cotton, 1 Woods, [267] 75; The Lucille, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 78 [22: 64]; The Charles Morgan, 115 U. S. 69, 75 [29: 316, 318]. We do not think that the fact that the claimants did not appeal from the decree of the district court alters the rule. When the libelants appealed, they did so in view of the rule, and took the risk of the result of a trial of the case de novo. The whole case was opened by their appeal, as much as it would have been if both parties had appealed, or if the appeal had been taken only by the claimants.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed, with costs, and without interest to the libelants on that decree.

TRAVELERS' INSURANCE COMPANY OF HARTFORD, CONNECTICUT, Plf. in Err., [457]

v.

CATHERINE L. EDWARDS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 457-469.)

Life insurance—oral notice to local agent, of death of insured—proofs of death—acts of company—waiver of strict performance of requirements of contract.

In an action on a policy of life insurance, it is held: that the whole course of dealing by the defendant Company shows that it recognised a local agent as its agent in receiving oral notice and proofs of the death of the insured, and so acted upon his information as to waive a strict performance of the contract, which required written notice of death and proofs thereof within a certain time, the proofs having been retained by the local agent beyond the required time.

Argued May 6, 9, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York. Opinion below, 22 Blatchf. 225. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Solomon Lincoln, for plaintiff in error:

The evidence fails to show that the defendant in error complied with the conditions of the policy in respect to notice.

The authority of Phillips to receive notices in behalf of the Company must be proved affirmatively, and there is no evidence that it existed. Phillips' duties, as testified to by himself and by his superior, do not confer or imply it. They are strictly defined and limited, and do not include the authority claimed.

His own declarations, as such, are not competent to prove it; and there is no evidence that any declarations or acts of his in excess of his authority, as strictly defined by himself and by the Company, were ever ratified by the Company, or even brought to its knowledge. The indorsement placed upon the proofs of death at Hartford is purely clerical, and even if assumed to be placed there by direction of the Company, it has no legal significance. It was not communicated to the assured, and was a mere private memorandum. Nothing can be inferred from it prejudicial to the Company; nor can the required authority be inferred from the general scope of employment of Mr. Phillips.

There is no evidence of waiver of the conditions by the Company. They could not be waived for the Company by Mr. Phillips. He was expressly limited in this respect by the premium receipt and by the policy, and this limitation was thus brought to the notice of the assured.

Massachusetts was the locus contractus, and the law of Massachusetts should govern the construction of the contract if different principles prevailed in different jurisdictions; but the law herein applicable, as administered by this court and by the courts of Massachusetts and New York, is the same, and, it is submitted, supports the position of the plaintiff in error.

Messrs. William N. Cogswell and William F. Cogswell, for defendant in error:

The conversation between Bartholomew and Phillips, the agent of the Company, was admissible. His answer, within the apparent scope of his authority, bound the Company.

Goodwin v. Mass. Mut. L. Ins. Co. 73 N. Y. 480; Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 222 (20:617).

The defense that proofs of death were not served within seven months, as required by the policy, cannot be maintained successfully.

Service upon the agent of the Company was a compliance with conditions of the policy requiring proofs of the death to be "furnished to the Company," entirely irrespective of the peculiar facts of this case.

Kendall v. Holland Purchase Ins. Co. 2 Thomp. & C. 375, affirmed in 58 N. Y. 682.

By leaving the proofs with the agent the plaintiff complied literally with his directions, and the Company is estopped from saying that the agent's instructions were unauthorized. They were within the apparent scope of his authority as agent, and the plaintiff relied upon them; and if the agent was remiss in his duties to the Company in not sending the proofs until after the time stipulated in the policy had expired, the defendant should suffer by its negligence, and not the plaintiff.

Goodwin v. Mass. Mut. L. Ins. Co. 73 N. Y. 480; Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, supra.

The defendant, having made no objection that the proofs were not delivered within the time required, has waived the right to interpose any such defense to the plaintiff's claim.

Goodwin v. Ins. Co. supra.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York.

The defendant in error, Catherine L. Edwards, obtained a judgment in the circuit court for the sum of $5,387.50 against the Travelers Insurance Company of Hartford, Connecticut, on a policy of insurance upon the life of her brother, Frank Edwards. The suit was originally instituted in the Supreme Court for Ontario County, New York, from whence it was removed by the plaintiff in error into the Circuit Court of the United States for that district. [458]

The record of a long trial before a jury is presented to us in a stenographic report of the proceedings there, which has been adopted by the parties and by the judge trying the case, as a bill of exceptions. It is obvious from this paper that the main controversy before the jury was upon a question of suicide set up by the defendant Company; but the brief of the plaintiff in error and its assignment of errors eliminates all this and relies upon the defense stated by the brief in the following language:

"Trial was had before a jury, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff; and the questions now arising are whether the plaintiff below complied with those conditions of the policy which required written notice to the Company of the death of the deceased, and proofs of the same within seven months thereafter; whether the action was prematurely brought by reason of the plaintiff's failure to comply with such conditions of the policy before bringing suit; and whether certain details of evidence bearing upon the foregoing questions were properly admitted against the objection of the Company."

The assignments of error correspond with this statement, and are given verbatim as follows:

"The circuit court erred:

"1. In that it admitted testimony relating to the acts and statements of Mr. E. M. Phillips, the local agent of the Insurance Company at Southbridge, Mass., with reference to the notice of death to be given by the defendant in error to the Insurance Company, and the delivery and reception of the proofs of death, as binding the Company and affecting the rights and duties of the parties to the contract of insurance, it not appearing that Phillips had authority to represent or bind the Company in this regard. (Record, pp. 22, 23, 28, 29, 58, 77.)

[459] "2. In that the court charged the jury as follows: 'If upon this evidence you find that upon the third of July, or during the seven months limited by the contract, the proofs of death which have been referred to were served upon Mr. Phillips, who was held out by this Company to be its agent, under the circumstances detailed in this case—that is, if you believe that he stated to the representatives of this assured that the proofs were to be left with him, and served upon him and not upon the Company—then, I say, for the purposes of this case, that that was sufficient service upon the Company, within the provisions of the contract.' (Charge, p. 79.)

"3. In that it refused to rule that the defendant in error had not furnished evidence of the notice of death required by the policy, inasmuch as there was no evidence that any notice in writing was given to the Company after the death of Edwards, or that proofs of death were furnished to or served upon the Company, and within seven months of his death, as required by the policy. (Pp. 29, 77, 78.)

"4. In that the court declined to charge the jury as follows: 'That, under the undisputed evidence in this case, the jury must find a verdict for the defendant under the facts alleged in the second separate answer' (p. 82; second separate answer p. 3.)

"5. In that it refused to rule that the suit was prematurely brought, because the plaintiff below had not at the time furnished due notice and proofs of death, as required by the policy, and ninety days thereafter had not elapsed. (P. 78.)"

The language of the policy upon this point is as follows:

"That in the event of the death of the person insured, then the party assured, or his or her legal representatives, shall give immediate notice in writing to the Company at Hartford, Conn., stating the time, place and cause of death, and shall within seven months thereafter, by direct and reliable evidence, furnish the Company with proofs of the same, giving full particulars, without fraud or concealment of any kind."

The answer of the defendant alleges that the plaintiff did not give to the defendant, at Hartford, or elsewhere, immediate notice in writing of the death of the said insured; and that de-[460] fendant did not receive from said plaintiff notice of the death of the said Frank Edwards until the 10th day of February, 1883, his death occurring on June 19, 1882; and that the plaintiff did not, within seven months after the last mentioned date, give notice in writing to the defendant, at Hartford, or elsewhere, nor in the manner and form as required by the policy, and has not delivered to or furnished the defendant with proofs of the death of said Frank Edwards, with full particulars; but, on the contrary, failed and neglected so to do.

The evidence on this subject shows substantially that Phillips was the agent at Southbridge, Massachusetts, of the defendant Corporation; that the application on which the policy issued was forwarded by Phillips to Hartford, the policy returned to him, and by him delivered to Edwards; that the receipt for the premium, signed by Rodney Dennis, secretary of the Company, declared in the body of it that the policy would not be valid until the above stated premium has been received during the lifetime of said Frank Edwards, and this receipt countersigned by E. M. Phillips, agent of this Company at Southbridge, Mass." On the margin of the receipt was the statement that "The agent who receives the within premium should countersign this receipt, and invariably state over his signature the date at which the payment is made to him." Across its face was written: "The within premium received and this receipt countersigned by me this 24th day of May, 1882. E. M. Phillips, agent at Southbridge, Mass." It was further indorsed: "All policies and agreements made by this Company are signed by its president or secretary. No other person can alter or waive any of the conditions of the policies or issue permits of any kind, or make agreements binding upon said Company. Rodney Dennis, Secretary."

The evidence further shows that on the day after the death of Edwards, a gentleman named Bartholomew, who was a friend, and probably the attorney, of the family, met Mr. Phillips in the street; that Phillips said to him in regard to Edwards, whose death was then just known, that he was insured in the Travelers' Life Insurance Company, and that he (Phillips) was going to Hartford. The witness, Bartholomew, testifies: "I asked him if that was so. I didn't [461] at that time know that he had a policy in that Company. He said he was going to Hartford, and would give to the Company the notice of his death, and would procure the blanks for the proofs of loss. I asked him if it would do as well for him to give the notice to the Company in that way as for any party interested. He said it would, and I think that was all that was said then; saw Mr. Phillips some days after that; met him somewhere in the street—can't tell where—and he told me he had been to Hartford and had procured the blanks, and that if I would come to his office he would deliver them to me."

The other evidence in the case, including that of Mr. Dennis, the secretary of the Company, leaves no doubt of the fact that Mr. Phillips informed him of the death of Edwards, and of all that was known about it at that time, though very little was known in Southbridge, as he died in Boston. Mr. Dennis gave Phillips the blanks for the regular proofs of death, which the Company always required, which blanks contained instructions as to how these proofs should be made out, and what should be contained in the affidavits directed by the Company to be made.

Mr. Phillips delivered these papers to Bartholomew within a day or two after his visit to Hartford, and said to him: "When you get them completed I want you to return them to me." This Bartholomew swears to positively; and Phillips, while he does not recall the direction to return them to him, says that he is not willing to swear to the contrary.

These affidavits were made out and delivered to Phillips on the third day of July. Through some neglect on his part they remained in his office beyond the period of seven months which the policy fixed as the time within which they should have been delivered at the Hartford office. His attention having been brought to these papers in some manner, not particularly described, he called upon Bartholomew with them and stated that they were not sufficient in regard to the particulars of the death of Edwards. They were afterwards returned to Phillips, who forwarded them to the Company about the 7th day of February, 1883, which the Company now insists was too late.

[462] The whole of the testimony upon this narrow issue turns upon the question whether the absence of a written notice of the death of the insured, when the Company had full notice of it through Phillips, their agent, and whether the delivery of the proofs of death to the Company after the expiration of the seven months, although they had been delivered to the agent Phillips within the time required, shall defeat a recovery.

The opinion of the judge who tried the case, on a motion for a new trial, states the facts as he understood them, and, as we think, with accuracy, together with his view of the law of the subject, so well that we transcribe it here:

"The facts are as follows: The insured died June 19, 1882. A day or two afterwards E. M. Phillips, who is described in the receipt referred to as 'agent of this Company at Southbridge, Mass.' met one of the family of the deceased on the street, informed him that he was going to Hartford and would give the Company the requisite notice, and would procure the necessary blanks for the proofs of death. He did go to Hartford on or about the 21st of June, saw the secretary of the Company, gave him notice of the death, stating all the particulars which he then knew, and obtained the blank proofs. On his return he handed the blanks to one of the plaintiff's representatives, saying at the time, 'When you get them completed I want you to return them to me.' They were filled out and delivered to him July 3, 1882. He retained them for several months, and then returned them to a brother of the plaintiff, saying that they were incomplete, and demanded additional information. On the 29th of January, 1883, they were again delivered to Phillips, and by him sent to the Company on or about the 7th of February. The Company, in acknowledging their receipt, made no objection that they were received too late, and retained them in its possession. They were produced on the trial by the defendant's counsel.

"It must be held that, if the plaintiff has not followed the contract literally in these particulars, it was because she was misled by the course of the defendant, and that the defendant is not now in a position to take advantage of the plaintiff's omission, having waived a strict performance of the contract." See Edwards v. Travelers L. Ins. Co. 22 Blatchf. 225.

[463] Without deciding whether this notice to Phillips, of the death of Edwards, would have been a sufficient compliance with the contract requiring a written notice of the death to be given to the Company at Hartford, if it had been attempted to comply with the condition in that manner, and without deciding whether, if the proofs of death had been made out and delivered to Phillips, with no more in the case than that, it would have been a sufficient compliance with that provision, we are of opinion that the whole course of dealing by the Company with Phillips and with the plaintiff below establish the proposition that the Company recognized Phillips as its agent for these purposes, and so acted upon his information of the death of Edwards as to accept that as sufficient notice, and to constitute him their agent for the purpose of receiving the proofs of death. Phillips went to the office of the Company in Hartford; he there gave the information of the death of Edwards to the Company, with such particulars as were then known in regard to the incidents of his death. The acting officer of the Company, the man who in his own testimony describes himself as having charge of claims for losses by death, then furnished him with the requisite blanks for the further proof required by formal affidavits of the parties. This officer knew that Phillips was treated by the insured as the agent of the Company for giving this notice, he accepted that notice, he acted upon it, and he entrusted Phillips, who was an agent of the Company and had been so for ten years or more, with the forms of affidavits necessary to show what the Company required to be proved in [467] order to justify them in paying the money upon the policy. Phillips undertook this business, delivered these blank affidavits, and stated to the plaintiff's agent that they were to be returned to him when completed. They were so returned to him, but, without sending them to the Company, after keeping them a long time in his possession, he again gave them to the plaintiff's agent, with the declaration that they were imperfect, and suggested further proofs.

Soon after this they were returned to him, though it is not stated whether any further proofs were made out or not, and he then forwarded them to the Company. He evidently considered himself as the agent of the Company when he required additional proofs. As confirmatory of this, the evidence shows that the Company received the proofs without objection; and when sometime afterwards a brother of the plaintiff made an inquiry of the Company in regard to them, they acknowledged that they had received them on the 10th day of February, but made no objection that it was too late. They also acknowledged thereceipt of "papers in the case of Frank Edwards," in the following letter, dated February 9, 1883:

"E. M. Phillips, Esq., ag't, Southbridge, Mass.

"Dear Sir: Your letter of the 7th inst., with papers in the case of Frank Edwards, at hand. We understand a chemical analysis of his stomach was made. We should like a full report of the analysis certified to by the chemist who made it.

"Yours Truly, Rodney Dennis, Sec'y."

In this there was no hint that the papers were received too late, or that no sufficient notice had been given, but simply the expression of a desire for further information with regard to the actual facts of the case, which would have been useless if the Company intended to rely upon the failure to give this notice in time.

Afterwards, on March 10, 1883, S. K. Edwards, "for Katy L. Edwards," the plaintiff below, wrote to the Company asking for the date of proof of death of Mr. Frank Edwards [468] and when it was received at the office. To this the following reply was made:

"The Travelers Insurance Co.,
Claim Department,
"Hartford, Ct., March 13, 1883.
"S. K. Edwards, Southbridge, Mass.

"Dear Sir: In reply to yours of 10th inst., would say that we received a letter from agent Phillips, dated February 7, 1883, wherein he writes: 'I found the inclosed upon my table on my return home, and forward the same.' The inclosed were incomplete proof papers relating to the death of Mr. Frank Edwards, and we acknowledged the receipt of same Feb'y 9th, asking for a full report of the analysis of Edwards' stomach, the report to be certified by the chemist who made the analysis. We have no further intelligence respecting the matter.

"Yours Truly, Rodney Dennis, Sec'y."

On March 20, S. K. Edwards, on behalf of his sister, again wrote to the Company making inquiry if February 9 was the first time they had the proofs of the death of Frank Edwards, to which the following reply was made:

"March 21, 1883.
'S. K. Edwards, Esq., Southbridge, Mass.

"Dear Sir: Your letter of the 20th inst. is at hand. We received the incomplete proofs of death, to which we alluded in our letter of 13th inst., on the 10th of February for the first and only time. We have only received them once.

"Yours Truly, Rodney Dennis, Sec'y."

During all the correspondence which passed upon this subject, Mr. Dennis, the officer of the Company, nowhere intimates that these proofs came too late, or that they were rejected by the Company; but the only complaint made was that he had not received the chemical analysis of the contents of the stomach.

Under all the circumstances of this case, we are of opinion that the Company treated Phillips as their agent for the purpose of the early [469] notice of the death of Edwards, and also the receipt of the final proofs thereof, and that it is too late for them now to undertake to defeat this action upon the ground that he was not their agent for any of these purposes.

We do not deem it necessary to go into a critical examination of the authorities upon the questions so often raised of the powers of agents of this class. We simply hold that whether, upon the face of the policy, and the receipt with its indorsements, taken alone, Phillips can be held to have been the agent of the Company to whom the notices in question could be properly delivered or not, that the action of the Company upon Phillips' communications to its secretary at Hartford of the information of the death of Edwards, and its delivery to him of the blank affidavits and forms which it required to be filled up, together with the subsequent correspondence, show conclusively that the Company considered Phillips as its agent throughout the transaction with regard to these notices, and it is, therefore, bound by what he did.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES, Plff. in Err., [197]
v.
CLEMENT A. AUFFMORDT ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 197-210.)

Duties—action to recover value of goods consigned to defendants by the owners—priority of statutes enacted the same day—amendment—object and effect of.

1. Where imported goods are the property of their manufacturer, the invoice need only state the fair market value of the goods at the place of manufacture, and it need not state "the actual cost thereof at the place of exportation." Therefore, an invoice of goods which belong to their manufacturer is not, nor is an entry of such goods, within the purview of section 2839, so as to make the person entering them with design to evade payment of duty liable to a forfeiture of their value.

2. The provision in section 2864, R. S., for the forfeiture of the value of such goods is superseded by the enactment of section 12 of the Act of June 22, 1874, which provides only for a forfeiture of the merchandise, and not for the forfeiture of its value; said Act, although passed on the same day as the Revised Statute, being a subsequent statute thereto.

3. The sole object of the amendment to section 2864, R. S., made by the Act of February 18, 1875, was to make said section read as it should have read in the printed volume, in the shape in which it was in force on December 1, 1873. The Act of February 18, 1875, was in no respect new legislation, nor a new law enacted to take effect from the date of its passage, in such wise as to alter any enactment made since the passage of the Revised Statutes.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Reported below, 19 Fed. Rep. 893. Affirmed.

The case fully appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. G. A. Jenks, Solicitor-Gen., for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Charles M. Da Costa and Tremain & Tyler, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opin- [198] ion of the court:

This is an action brought by the United States, in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, against Clement A. Auffmordt, John F. Degener, William Degener, and Adolph William Von Kessler, composing the firm of C. A. Auffmordt & Co., to recover the sum of $321,519.29, with interest.

The complaint alleges violations by the defendants of Statutes of the United States in respect to entries of imported merchandise made by the defendants in 1879, 1880, 1881 and 1882, the value of such merchandise being the above named sum, and claims that by reason of the acts of the defendants alleged in the complaint the defendants have forfeited such value to the United States. The defendants put in an answer containing a general denial, and the case was tried in the district court before a jury.

After the case was opened to the jury on the part of the United States, and before any testimony was offered, the defendants moved, upon such opening, that the court direct a verdict for the defendants, on the ground that there was no statute of the United States whereby the value of the merchandise could be recovered by reason of the acts alleged to have been committed by the defendants as consignees of the goods, which was the capacity in which they received and entered the goods, the goods being the property of the manufacturers of them in Switzerland, and being consigned to the defendants for sale on commission. The facts sought to be proved against the defendants were that they, knowingly and with intent to defraud the revenue, entered the goods at in- [199] voice prices lower than their actual market value at the time and place of exportation. The court ruled that there was no existing statute of the United States under which the plaintiff could recover upon any possible proof, and that a verdict must be directed for the defendants. 19 Fed. Rep. 893. The plaintiff excepted to this ruling.

The two sections of the Revised Statutes upon which the United States base their right of recovery in the case are sections 2839 and 2864. Section 2839 was originally enacted as part of section 66 of the Act of March 2, 1799, chap. 22, 1 Stat. at L. 677, and reads as follows:

"Sec. 2839. If any merchandise, of which entry has been made in the office of a collector, is not invoiced according to the actual cost thereof at the place of exportation, with design [203] to evade payment of duty, all such merchandise, or the value thereof, to be recovered of the person making entry, shall be forfeited."

Section 2864 was originally enacted as part of section 1 of the Act of March 8, 1863, chap. 76, 12 Stat. at L. 738, and reads as follows: "Sec. 2864. If any owner, consignee or agent of any merchandise shall knowingly make, or attempt to make, an entry thereof by means of any false invoice, or false certificate of a consul, vice consul, or commercial agent, or of any invoice which does not contain a true statement of all the particulars hereinbefore required, or by means of any other false or fraudulent document or paper, or of any other false or fraudulent practice or appliance whatsoever, such merchandise, or the value thereof, shall be forfeited."

The bill of exceptions contains the following statement as to the proceedings after the above ruling of the court: The plaintiff asked leave to prove, successively, that items contained in the invoices mentioned in the complaint and bill of particulars were undervalued, within the meaning of the last clause of section 12 of the Act of June 22, 1874, which reads as follows: "Anything contained in any Act which provides for the forfeiture or confiscation of an entire invoice in consequence of any item or items contained in the same being undervalued, be, and the same is hereby, repealed;" that the defendants, being consignees of the merchandise mentioned in the complaint, knowingly made entries thereof by means of false invoices; that the defendants, being agents of the merchandise mentioned in the complaint, knowingly made entry thereof by means of false invoices; that the defendants, being consignees of the merchandise mentioned in the complaint, knowingly made entry thereof by means of invoices which did not contain a true statement of the particulars required in that part of the Act of March 8, 1863, preceding the provision of the Act which was re-enacted as section 2864 of the Revised Statutes; that the defendants, being agents of the merchandise mentioned in the complaint, knowingly made entry thereof by means of invoices which did not contain a true statement of the particulars required in that part of the Act of March 8, 1863, preceding the provision of the Act which was re-enacted as section 2864 of the Revised Statutes; that the defendants, being the consignees of the merchandise mentioned in the complaint, knowingly made entry thereof by means of false and fraudulent documents and papers; and that the defendants, being the agents of the merchandise mentioned in the complaint, knowingly made entry thereof by means of false and fraudulent documents and papers. These requests being successively denied, the plaintiff excepted to each refusal. The jury, under direction of the court, found a verdict for the defendants, to which direction the plaintiff excepted. After a judgment for the defendants, the plaintiff took the case to the circuit court by a writ of error, where the judgment was affirmed; and they have brought the case to this court by a writ of error.

The main contentions on the part of the defendants are that section 2839 relates only to purchased goods, and not to consigned goods, and that section 2864 is superseded by section 12 of the Act of June 22, 1874, chap. 391, 18 Stat. at L. 188. These contentions were sustained by the district court in its opinion.

Section 2839 provides for the forfeiture of merchandise, or the value thereof, "To be recovered of the person making entry," where the merchandise is "not invoiced according to the actual cost thereof at the place of exportation, with design to evade payment of duty." This section, originally enacted in 1799, is applicable only to goods which are required to be invoiced according to their actual cost at the place of exportation. Alfonso v. U. S. 2 Story, 421, 429, 432. By section 2841 of the Revised Statutes, originally section 4 of the Act of March 1, 1823, chap. 21, 3 Stat. at L. 780, 782, forms of oaths on the entry of goods are prescribed, one for the "consignee, importer, or agent," one for the "owner in cases where merchandise has been actually purchased," and a third for the "manufacturer or owner in cases where merchandise has not been actually purchased." In the first form of oath, the oath is that the invoice "exhibits the actual cost (if purchased), or fair market value (if otherwise obtained)," at the time and place of procurement. In the second form of oath, the oath is that the oath contains "a just and faithful account of the actual cost" In the third form of oath, the oath is that the goods were not actually bought by the importer or consignee, or by his agent, in the ordinary mode of bargain and sale, but that nevertheless the invoice "contains a just and faithful valuation of the same, at their fair market value" at the place of procurement.

Section 2845, originally section 8 of the Act of March 1, 1823, chap. 21, 3 Stat. at L. 733, provides that "No merchandise subject to ad valorem duty, belonging to a person not residing at the time in the United States, who has not acquired the same in the ordinary mode of bargain and sale, or belonging to the manufacturer, in whole or in part, of the same, shall be admitted to entry, unless the invoice thereof is [204] verified by the oath of the owner or of one of the owners, * * * certifying that the invoice contains a true and faithful account of the merchandise, at its fair market value, at the time and place when and where the same was procured or manufactured, as the case may be."

Section 2854, originally a part of section 1 of the Act of March 3, 1863, chap. 76, 12 Stat. at L. 737, provides as follows: "All such invoices" (that is, all invoices of merchandise imported from any foreign country), "shall, at or before the shipment of the merchandise, be produced to the consul, vice consul, or commercial agent of the United States nearest the place of shipment, for the use of the United States, and shall have indorsed thereon, when so produced, a declaration signed by the purchaser, manufacturer, owner or agent, setting forth that the invoice is in all respects true; that it contains, if the merchandise mentioned therein is subject to ad valorem duty, and was obtained by purchase, a true and full statement of the time when and the place where the same was purchased, and the actual cost thereof, and of all charges thereon; and that no discounts, bounties or drawbacks are contained in the invoice but such as have actually been allowed thereon; and when obtained in any other manner than by purchase, the actual market value thereof at the time and place when and where the same was procured or manufactured; and if subject to specific duty, the actual quantity thereof; and that no different invoice of the merchandise, mentioned in the invoice so produced, has been or will be furnished to any one. If the merchandise was actually purchased, the declaration shall also contain a statement that the currency in which such invoice is made out is the currency which was actually paid for the merchandise by the purchaser."

[206] It is quite clear, from the above provisions, that where imported goods are the property of their manufacturer, the invoice need only state the fair market value of the goods at the place of manufacture, and it need not state "the actual cost thereof at the place of exportation." Therefore, an invoice of goods which belong to their manufacturer is not, nor is an entry of such goods, within the purview of section 2889, so as to make the person entering them with design to evade payment of duty liable to a forfeiture of their value.

The most serious question arises in respect to section 2864, which is alleged to have been superseded by section 12 of the Act of June 22, 1874. The two statutes are here placed in parallel columns:

"If any owner, consignee, or agent of any merchandise shall knowingly make, or attempt to make, an entry thereof by means of any false invoice, or false certificate of a consul, vice consul, or commercial agent, or of any invoice which does not contain a true statement of all the particulars hereinbefore required, or by means of any other false or fraudulent document or paper, or of any other false or fraudulent practice or appliance whatsoever, such merchandise or the value thereof shall be forfeited."	"That any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make, or attempt to make, any entry of imported merchandise, by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter, or paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or who shall be guilty of any willful act or omission by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties, or any portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise, or any portion thereof, embraced or referred to in such invoice, affidavit, letter, paper, or statement, or affected by such act or omission, shall, for each offense, be fined in any sum not exceeding five thousand dollars nor less than fifty dollars, or be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, or both; and, in addition to such fine, such merchandise shall be forfeited; which forfeiture shall only apply to the whole of the merchandise in the case or package containing the particular article or articles of merchandise to which said fraud or alleged fraud relates; and anything contained in any Act which provides for the forfeiture or confiscation of an entire invoice in consequence of any item or items contained in the same being undervalued, be, and the same is hereby repealed."

Assuming that the language of section 2864, declaring that the merchandise or its value shall be forfeited, would authorize a suit in personam, without a seizure of the merchandise, and also assuming that the suit for a forfeiture of the value may be brought against the owner, consignee or agent, the question for determination is whether the provision in section 2864, for a forfeiture of the value, is superseded by the enactment of section 12 of the Act of June 22, 1874, which provides only for a forfeiture of the merchandise, and does not provide for any forfeiture of its value.

Section 13 of the Act of June 22, 1874, provides that any merchandise entered by any person violating section 12, but not subject to forfeiture under that section, may, while owned by him or while in his possession, "to double the amount claimed, be taken by the collector and held as security for the payment of any fine or fines incurred as aforesaid." Section 14 provides that the omission, without intent thereby to defraud the revenue, to add, on entry, to the invoice, certain specified charges, shall not be a cause of forfeiture of the goods "or of the value thereof." Section 16 provides that, in suits to enforce the forfeiture of goods, "or to recover the value thereof," no fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall be imposed unless the jury shall find that the alleged acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States. Section 26 repeals all Acts and parts of Acts inconsistent with the provisions of that Act. There is not in the Act any other repealing provision, except that contained in the concluding words of section 12, above quoted.

The Act of June 22, 1874, was passed on the same day with the Revised Statutes, section 5595 of which declares that the Revised Statutes embrace the general and permanent Statutes of the United States which were in force on the first day of December, 1873. Section 5601 declares that the enactment of the revision is not to affect or repeal any Act of Congress passed since the first day of December, 1873; that all Acts passed since that date are to have full effect, as if passed after the enactment of the revision; and that, so far as such Acts vary from or conflict with any provision contained in the revision, they are to have effect as subsequent statutes, and as repealing any portion of the revision inconsistent therewith. The Act of June 22, 1874, is, therefore, a subsequent statute to the Revised Statutes, and repeals any portion thereof which is inconsistent with such subsequent statute.

On a full review of the above recited provisions of the Act of June 22, 1874, and of its other provisions, it is apparent that, so far, at least, as the acts subject to the penalties denounced in section 2864 are concerned, they are entirely covered by the provisions of section 12 of the Act of June 22, 1874. There is no act denounced by section 2864 that is not embraced, both as to person and character of act, by the provisions of section 12. The latter section adds, as a punishment for the offense, fine [209] or imprisonment or both, and a forfeiture of the merchandise, in addition to the fine. It leaves out a forfeiture of the value of the merchandise; and forfeiture of such value is inconsistent with the terms of section 12, and is therefore repealed by it. The absolute forfeiture of the merchandise, provided for by section 12, is inconsistent, also, with the alternative forfeiture of the merchandise or its value, provided for by section 2864. The provisions of the two statutes cannot stand together. Norris v. Crocker, 54 U. S. 18 How. 429, 438[14: 210, 213]: U. S. v. Tynen, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 88, 92 [20: 153, 154] Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 590, 617 [22: 429, 437]; U. S. v. Claflin, 97 U. S. 546, 552, 553 [24: 1082, 1085]; King v. Cornell, 106 U. S. 395, 396 [27: 60]; Pana v. Bowler, 107 U. S. 529, 538 [27: 424, 428].

The considerations covered by the foregoing views are so well discussed and enforced in the opinion of the district judge in this case that it is not deemed necessary further to enlarge upon them.

Section 2864 of the Revised Statutes, when originally enacted on the 22d of June, 1874, did not contain the words "or the value thereof" after the words "such merchandise." By the Act of February 18, 1875, chap. 80, 18 Stat. at L. 319, entitled "An Act to Correct Errors and to Supply Omissions in the Revised Statutes of the United States," and which Act states "That, for the purpose of correcting errors and supplying omissions in the Act entitled 'An Act to Revise and Consolidate the Statutes of the United States in Force on the First Day of December, Anno Domini One Thousand Eight Hundred and Seventy-Three,' so as to make the same truly express such laws, the following amendments are hereby made therein," it is provided as follows: "Section two thousand eight hundred and sixty-four is amended by inserting in the last line, after the word 'merchandise,' the words 'or the value thereof.'" Section two of the Act directs the Secretary of State, "if practicable, to cause this Act to be printed and bound in the volume of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

It is contended for the United States that this amendment to section 2864, made by the Act of February 18, 1875, can be reasonably accounted for only upon the theory that, at the date it was made, which was after the passage of the Act of June 22, 1874, chap. 391, Congress regarded section 2864, as thus amended, [210] as a valid existing law, particularly in respect to the amendment, and intended to declare that the value of the merchandise should be forfeited under section 2864, notwithstanding the passage of the Act of June 22, 1874, chap. 391. But we are of opinion that the amendment made by the Act of February 18, 1875, did not have the effect contended for. Its sole object was to correct errors and supply omissions in the text of the Revised Statutes, as its title indicates, so as to make the same truly express the statutes in force on the first of December, 1873, and it made special reference to the printed volume of the Revised Statutes. It was in no respect new legislation, nor a new law enacted to take effect from the date of its passage, in such wise as to alter any enactment made since the passage of the Revised Statutes. The intention was to make section 2864 read as it ought to have read in the printed volume, in the shape in which it was in force on the first day of December, 1873, as a part of section 1 of the Act of March 3, 1863, chap. 76, 12 Stat. at L. 738. It left the the Act of June 22, 1874, chap. 391, to have its full effect in respect to section 2864, in like manner as if the words "or the value thereof" had been contained in that section, in the printed volume of the Revised Statutes. There was a law in force on December 1, 1873, and subsequently thereto, down to June 22, 1874, authorizing a forfeiture of the value of merchandise for the causes stated in section 2864, and the fact that forfeitures of such value might have been incurred during the intervening period between December 1, 1873, and June 22, 1874, was a sufficient reason for the correction made in section 2864.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

R. WALTER & COMPANY, Judgment Cred- [320]
itors of LAKE & AUSTIN, Plffs. in Err.,

v.

BICKHAM & MOORE.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 320-326.)

Practice—levy of attachment—whether by proper officer—subsequent consent order of sale—subsequent judgment creditors cannot object to regularity of original levy.

Where, after the levy of an attachment, upon the consent of the attachment creditors, the debtors and their assignee, the attached goods have been sold by order of the court, and the proceeds paid to the clerk to be held subject to the order of the court, subsequent judgment creditors cannot be heard to object to the manner in which the property was originally seized and brought into court and made subject to its orders.

Submitted May 11, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Mississippi. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. M. R. Walter, for plaintiffs in error.

No counsel appeared for defendants in error.

September 29, 1883, Bickham & Moore, creditors of Lake & Austin, sued out from the court below an attachment against the property of said debtors, directed to the Marshal of the United States for the Northern District of Mississippi. The writ came to the hands of that officer for execution. The attorney of the plaintiffs informed him that "he wanted a blank deputization on a writ of attachment to send to Grenada," which was the place of the residence of the debtors. This request was at first denied, but finally the following indorsement was made on the writ: "I hereby appoint ——— ——— my special deputy to execute this writ, the plaintiff not holding me for the acts of such deputy. J. L. Morphis, U. S. Marshal." The writ, so indorsed, was delivered to the attorney of the attaching creditors and he proceeded to Grenada with it.

The marshal testifies that he made the above indorsement with the understanding that the blank should be filled up with the name of a "bonded officer." Application being made to R. A. Hall, Sheriff of Grenada County, to execute the writ, that officer agreed to do so. His name was accordingly inserted in the blank left in the indorsement thereon. He subsequently declined to act. Thereupon, the attorney for the attaching creditors erased the name of Hall and filled the blank with the name of Samuel Ladd, who was a town marshal. The latter executed the attachment on the second of October, 1883, by levying upon certain property belonging to Lake, and to Lake & Austin. At a late hour of the same day, a regular deputy of the marshal appeared at Grenada and [322] took possession of the personal property, which had been previously seized by Ladd under the writ of attachment. The writ was also delivered to him by Ladd.

On the 19th day of October, 1883, the following order of sale was made in the cause:

"Upon the application and consent, by attorneys, of all the creditors who have heretofore sued out attachments in this court against Lake & Austin, defendants, and upon consent of said defendants and A. C. Hebron, claimant, as assignee in the deed of assignment executed by said Lake & Austin, and with the consent of all other and non-attaching creditors of said Lake & Austin, who are this day represented by Messrs. Sullivan & Sullivan and Slack & Longstreet, and it appearing unto the court that an immediate sale of the effects so assigned and attached will best promote and subserve the interests of all and each and every of the creditors of said Lake & Austin; Therefore, It is ordered, adjudged and decreed by the court that the marshal of this judicial district shall sell at public auction, for cash, to the highest bidder, in one bulk, all the dry goods, groceries, and all other merchandise assigned by said Lake & Austin and subsequently attached and seized under writs issued from this court as aforesaid, * * * and when so sold, the proceeds of such sale said marshal shall immediately pay to the clerk of this court, and be held subject to the orders of this court. The proceeds of such sale shall stand in all respects in lieu of and represent the goods and effects assigned and attached, and be liable as said property and effects now and to said attachment liens in their order, and not further or otherwise; and the rights of the parties claiming said goods and effects to replevy the same or to reduce the same or any part thereof upon claim made and the execution of bond, as required by law, shall be in no wise prejudiced or affected by said sale; nor shall the consent to said sale in any wise operate as a waiver of or to the prejudice of any right, benefit, or advantage now held, possessed or claimed by said parties or any of them, but all and singular the same shall be preserved, this being simply a consent order, and intended to convert the property into money in order to protect the same from waste and great depreciation, and to let the [323] money represent the property in all respects in the litigation. It is further ordered that said marshal do keep accounts of his said sales, showing the amount of proceeds of the several assets sold in the several bulks."

A sale was had pursuant to that order, and the sum of $24,550—not more than sufficient to satisfy the claim of the plaintiffs and their costs—was realized, and paid over to the clerk of the court. The return of sale shows that so much of the order as required the sale of the books of account and choses in action was rescinded, and the notes levied on were delivered to A. C. Hebron "in accordance with an agreement between counsel for plaintiff and defendants."

On the 20th day of November, 1884, the plaintiffs in error, creditors of Lake & Austin, procured a judgment against the latter for $6,800.26, and obtained thereon a writ of garnishment against the marshal and clerk of the court.

On the second of January, 1884, the same judgment creditors moved the court to discharge the levy made in behalf of Bickham & Moore upon the following grounds:

"1. Because said alleged levy was not made by the U. S. Marshal or any of his deputies, or by anyone duly authorized to execute said writ of attachment.

"2. Because the writ of attachment in this cause was levied and executed by Sam. Ladd, who was not and is not an officer of this court from which said writ emanated and was returnable, said Ladd not being either a regular deputy U. S. Marshal or a special deputy.

"3. Because Mr. H. M. Sullivan, one of the attorneys for plaintiffs in this cause, appointed said Sam. Ladd to execute the said writ of attachment.

"4. Because J. L. Morphis, the U. S. Marshal for the Northern District of Mississippi, appointed R. N. Hall, Sheriff of Grenada County, his deputy to execute the said writ of attachment in this cause, by his written deputation upon the back of and on the said writ of attachment, which said writ was sued out in the U. S. Court for the Northern District of Mississippi; and said writ was not executed by said Hall, who was so appointed, but was executed by said Sam. Ladd upon the appointment of Mr. H. M. Sullivan as aforesaid, without any further author- [324]

ity from said U. S. Marshal, by striking out the name of said Hall, upon his own motion, upon said Hall's declining to act, and substituting the name of Sam. Ladd in place and stead thereof.

"5. Because said levy was not made by any lawful officer whatever, or by anyone duly appointed to make said levy."

The motion was denied, and the present writ of error is brought to reverse that judgment.

On behalf of the plaintiff it is insisted: 1. That the law does not authorize anyone to serve writs directed to a marshal, except that officer himself, or such of his appointees as may have [325] duly qualified as deputies, by taking the oath or affirmation prescribed by section 782 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and that service by anyone else is void. 2. Assuming that an appointee of the marshal, who was not thus qualified, can serve process directed to the marshal, the latter has no right to delegate to another his power of appointment; and he cannot ratify such an appointment, nor validate a levy made in his name by one not lawfully appointed. 3. Assuming that the marshal has the right to delegate his power of appointment, the authority conferred by him on the attorney of Bickham & Moore was exhausted after Hall's appointment and agreement to serve.

On the other hand, it may be claimed that, if the appointment of Ladd to execute the attachment was illegal, and if his levy was void, the subsequent action of a regular deputy of the marshal in taking possession of the attached property, and holding it under the writ delivered to him by Ladd, made the levy from that time so far valid that the property was thereafter to be deemed in the lawful custody of such deputy, under the writ of attachment.

It is unnecessary to determine any of these questions; for the record shows that on the 19th of October, 1878—before the plaintiffs in error obtained their judgment against Lake & Austin, and, therefore, before they had acquired any special interest in the property—the court below, upon the application and with the consent of all the creditors who had theretofore sued out attachments, and with the consent, as well as of the debtors themselves as of Hebron, the assignee in the deed of assignment executed by the debtors, the attached effects were sold by order of the court, and the proceeds paid, pursuant to that order, to the clerk. Thus, every person, who was in a position, in reference to the property, to object to the manner in which the writ of attachment was executed consented that the property be placed under the control of the court, the proceeds of the sale to be applied to the attachment liens in their order.

[326] Under these circumstances, creditors who did not obtain judgments until after such consent order was made, cannot be heard to object to the manner in which the property was originally seized and brought into court, and made subject to its orders. The attaching creditors, the debtors, and the assignee of the debtors, having all approved what was done, subsequent judgment creditors—the consent order of sale not being impeached on the ground of fraud—acquired no such rights in the property as entitled them to question the disposition made of it or of the proceeds of sale.

The judgment is affirmed.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Plff. in Err., [347]
v.
WILLIAM PENDLETON, Deft. in Err.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 347-359.)

Constitutional law—interstate commerce—intercourse by telegraph—transmission into, and delivery in, other States—State cannot regulate—Indiana Statute, void.

1. Intercourse by telegraph between the States is interstate commerce.
2. A State has no authority to regulate the transmission of telegraphic messages into other States and their delivery therein.
3. The Statute of Indiana, which attempts to regulate the mode in which messages sent by telegraphic companies doing business in said State shall be delivered in other States, is void, such regulation being an interference with the freedom of interstate commerce.

[No. 267.]

Argued April 27, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Field: [348]

The Statute of Indiana declares that "Every electric telegraph company, with a line of wires wholly or partly in this State, and engaged in telegraphing for the public, shall, during the usual office hours, receive dispatches, whether from other telegraphing lines or from individuals; and on payment or tender of the usual charge, according to the regulations of such company, shall transmit the same with impartiality and good faith, and in the order of time in which they are received, under penalty, in case of failure to transmit, or if postponed out of such order, of one hundred dollars, to be recovered by the person whose dispatch is neglected or postponed; Provided, however, That arrangements may be made with the publishers of newspapers for the transmission of intelligence of general and public interest out of its order, and that communications for and from officers of justice shall take precedence of all others." Sec. 4176, R. S. Ind. 1881. And that "Such companies shall deliver all dispatches, by messenger, to the persons to whom the same are addressed, or to their agents, on the payment of any charges due for the same; Provided, Such persons or agents reside within one mile of the telegraphic station, or within the city or town in which such station is." Sec. 4178, Id.

The present action is brought by William Pendleton, the plaintiff below, to recover of the Western Union Telegraph Company the penalty of $100 prescribed by the above statute, for failing to deliver at Ottumwa, in Iowa, a message received by it in Indiana for transmission to that place. The complaint, as finally amended, alleges that the defendant below, the Western Union Telegraph Company, is a corporation organized and subsisting under the laws of Indiana, with a line of wires from Shelbyville, in that State, to Ottumwa, in Iowa; that on the 14th of April, 1883, at thirty-five [349] minutes past 5 o'clock in the afternoon, at which time the Company was engaged in telegraphing for the public, the plaintiff delivered to its agent at its office in Shelbyville, the following telegram for transmission to its office in Ottumwa, viz.:

"April 14th, 1883.

"To Rosa Pendleton; care James Harker, Near city graveyard, Ottumwa, Iowa.

"Have you shipped things? If not, don't ship. Answer quick.

"Wm. Pendleton;"

That upon its delivery, the plaintiff paid the agent sixty cents, being the amount of the charge required for its transmission from Shelbyville to Ottumwa; that, without any fault or interference on his part, the Company, after transmitting the message to Ottumwa, where it was received at half past seven in the afternoon of that day, failed to deliver it either to Rosa Pendleton or to James Harker, whereby the plaintiff sustained damage, and the defendant became liable for $100, under the Statute of Indiana; for which sum plaintiff demands judgment.

To this Complaint the Company answered, admitting the receipt of the telegram as alleged, and setting up that it transmitted the message with impartiality and good faith, in the order of time in which it was received, and without delay, to its office in Ottumwa, Iowa, where it was received, as alleged, at half past seven of that day; that James Harker, to whose care the message was directed, lived more than one mile from the telegraph station at Ottumwa; that, in accordance with the usual custom of the office, the message was, without delay, placed in the postoffice of that town, with proper stamp thereon, and duly addressed; and that the telegram was received by the person to whom it was addressed on the following morning, April 15, 1883, at about 9 o'clock.

The answer further set forth that the duties and liabilities of telegraph companies in Iowa, and the transmission and delivery of the telegrams within the State, are regulated by a special statute of that State, which is as follows, [350] viz.: "Any person employed in transmitting messages by telegraph must do so without unreasonable delay; and anyone who willfully fails thus to transmit them, or who intentionally transmits a message erroneously, or makes known the contents of any message sent or received to any person, except him to whom it is addressed or to his agent or attorney, is guilty of a misdemeanor. The proprietor of a telegraph is liable for all mistakes in transmitting messages made by any person in his employment, and for all damages resulting from a failure to perform any other duties required by law;" that by that statute the defendant was not required to deliver telegrams by messenger to the persons to whom they were addressed; that in the City of Ottumwa it had established a certain district within which it delivered telegrams by messenger; and that on the receipt of the telegram in question at Ottumwa it was ascertained that Harker, to whose care it was addressed, did not reside within the delivery district, but outside of it, and more than one mile from the defendant's office, and that, in accordance with the custom and usage of the office, and in order to facilitate the delivery of the message, a copy of the telegram was promptly placed in the postoffice at Ottumwa, with proper address, and delivered as stated above.

To this answer the plaintiff demurred; the Circuit Court of the State sustained the demurrer; and, the defendant electing to stand upon its answer, judgment was rendered for the plaintiff for $100, which, on appeal to the Supreme Court of the State, was affirmed, and the Company brings the case here for review.

Messrs. Augustus L. Mason, Joseph K. McDonald, and John M. Butler, for plaintiff in error:

The business of telegraphing from one State to another is interstate commerce, within the meaning of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States.

Pensacola Tel. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 96 U. S. 1 (24: 708); Telegraph Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460 (26: 1067).

The power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce is exclusive in all cases where the subject over which the power is exercised is in its nature national, or admits of one uniform system or plan of regulation. The inaction of Congress upon such a subject is equivalent to a declaration that it shall be free from all state regulation or interference.

S. 485 (24: 547), on page 497 (551); R. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465 (24: 527).

The subject over which the power of regulation is attempted to be exercised in this case is in its nature national and properly admits only of one uniform system or plan of regulation.

Telegraph Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, 466 (24: 1067, 1068).

Acts rendered penal by law are penal only because the law of the place where committed makes them so.

(No counsel appeared for defendant in error.)

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of [356]
the court, as follows:

The contention of the Western Union Telegraph Company is that the law of Indiana is in conflict with the clause of the Constitution vesting in Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States.

In Telegraph Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460 [26: 1067], it was decided by this court that intercourse by the telegraph between the States is interstate commerce. Its language was: "A telegraph company occupies the same relation to commerce as a carrier of messages that a railroad company does as a carrier of goods. Both companies are instruments of commerce, and their business is commerce itself. They do their transportation in different ways, and their liabilities are in some respects different; but they are both indispensable to those engaged to any considerable extent in commercial pursuits."

Although intercourse by telegraphic messages between the States is thus held to be interstate commerce, it differs in material particulars from that portion of commerce with foreign countries and between the States which consists in the carriage of persons and the transportation and exchange of commodities, upon which we have been so often called to pass. It differs not only in the subjects which it transmits, but in the means of transmission. Other commerce deals only with persons, or with visible and tangible things. But the telegraph transports nothing visible and tangible: it carries only ideas, wishes, orders and intelligence. Other commerce requires the constant attention and supervision of the carrier for the safety of the persons and property carried. The message of the telegraph passes at once beyond the control of the sender, and reaches the office to which it is sent instantaneously. It is plain, from these essentially different characteristics, [357] that the regulations suitable for one of these kinds of commerce would be entirely inapplicable to the other.

In the consideration of numerous cases in which questions have arisen relating to ordinary commerce with foreign countries and between the States, this court has reached certain conclusions as to what subjects of commerce the regulation of Congress is exclusive, and indicated on what subjects the States may exercise a concurrent authority until Congress intervenes and assumes control. Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 53 U. S. 12 How. 299 [13:996]; Gilman v. Phila. 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 713 [18:96]; Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U.S. 6 Wall. 35 [18:745]; Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275 [23:347]; Henderson v. Mayor, 92 U. S. 259 [23:543]; Inman Steamship Co. v. Tinker, 94 U. S. 238 [24:118]; Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 485 [24:547]; County of Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691 [26:238]; Transportation Co. v. Parkersburgh, 107 U. S. 691 [27:584]; Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pa. 114 U. S. 196 [29:158]; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Ill. 118 U. S. 557 [ante, 244]; and Robbins v. Shelby Tax. Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 493 [ante, 694]. But with reference to the new species of commerce, consisting of intercourse by telegraphic messages, this court has only in two cases been called upon to inquire into the power of Congress and of the State over the subject. In Pensacola Tel. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 96 U. S. 1 [24:708], this court had before it the Act of Congress of July 24, 1866, 14 Stat. at L. 221, "To aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure the use of the same for postal, military and other purposes;" and it held that the Act was constitutional so far as it declared that the erection of telegraph wires should, as against state interference, be free to all who accepted its terms and conditions, and that a telegraph company of one State accepting them could not be excluded by another State from prosecuting its business within her jurisdiction. In Telegraph Company v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460 [supra], from the opinion in which we have quoted above, it was held that a statute of Texas imposing a tax upon every message transmitted by a telegraph company doing business within its limits, so far as it operated on messages sent out of the State, was a regulation of foreign and interstate commerce, and, therefore, beyond the power of the State.

In these cases the supreme authority of Congress over the subject of commerce by the telegraph with foreign countries or among the States is affirmed, whenever that body chooses to exert its power; and it is also held that the States can impose no impediments to the freedom of that commerce. In conformity with [358] these views the attempted regulation by Indiana of the mode in which messages sent by telegraphic companies doing business within her limits shall be delivered in other States cannot be upheld. It is an impediment to the freedom of that form of interstate commerce, which is as much beyond the power of Indiana to interpose as the imposition of a tax by the State of Texas upon every message transmitted by a telegraph company within her limits to other States was beyond her power. Whatever authority the State may possess over the transmission and delivery of messages by telegraph companies within her limits, it does not extend to the delivery of messages in other States.

The object of vesting the power to regulate commerce in Congress was to secure, with reference to its subjects, uniform regulations, where such uniformity is practicable, against conflicting state legislation. Such conflicting legislation would inevitably follow with reference to telegraphic communications between citizens of different States, if each State was vested with power to control them beyond its own limits. The manner and order of the delivery of telegrams, as well as of their transmission, would vary according to the judgment of each State. Indiana, as seen by its law given above, has provided that communications for or from officers of justice shall take precedence, and that arrangements may be made with publishers of newspapers for the transmission of intelligence of general and public interest out of its order, but that all other messages shall be transmitted in the order in which they are received; and punishes as an offense a disregard of this rule. Her attempt, by penal statutes, to enforce a delivery of such messages in other States, in conformity with this rule, could hardly fail to lead to collision with their statutes. Other States might well direct that telegrams on many other subjects should have precedence in delivery within their limits over [359] some of these, such as telegrams for the attendance of physicians and surgeons in case of sudden sickness or accident, telegrams calling for aid in cases of fire or other calamity, and telegrams respecting the sickness or death of relatives.

Indiana also requires telegrams to be delivered by messengers to the persons to whom they are addressed, if they reside within one mile of the telegraph station, or within the city and town in which such station is; and the require-nent applies, according to the decision of its supreme court in this case, when the delivery is to be made in another State. Other States might conclude that the delivery by messenger to a person living in a town or city being many miles in exten was an unwise burden, and require the duty within less limits; but if the law of one State can prescribe the order and manner of delivery in another State, the receiver of the message would often find himself incurring a penalty because of conflicting laws, both of which he could not obey. Conflict and confusion would only follow the attempted exercise of such a power. We are clear that it does not exist in any State.

The Supreme Court of Indiana placed its decision in support of the statute principally upon the ground that it was the exercise of the police power of the State. Undoubtedly, under the reserved powers of the State, which are designated under that somewhat ambiguous term of police powers, regulations may be prescribed by the State for the good order, peace and protection of the community. The subjects upon which the State may act are almost infinite; yet in its regulations with respect to all of them there is this necessary limitation: that the State does not thereby encroach upon the free exercise of the power vested in Congress by the Constitution. Within that limitation it may undoubtedly make all necessary provisions with respect to the buildings, poles and wires of telegraph companies within its jurisdiction which the comfort and convenience of the community may require.

It follows from the views expressed that the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion; and it is so ordered.

MINNEAPOLIS GAS LIGHT COMPANY, Appt., v. KERR MURRAY MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

Bill to enforce mechanics' lien—construction of contract—review of evidence.

Upon a bill filed to enforce a mechanics' lien for the price and value of a certain gas holder, alleged to have been constructed and erected by complainant for the defendant, upon a review of the evidence it is held: that the contract for the construction of said gas holder did not fix any time for its completion; that it was completed within a reasonable time; and that the allowance made by the court below, on account of inferiority in the quality of the material used and of the workmanship, was sufficient.

Argued May 9, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Anson B. Jackson and P. M. Babcock, for appellant.

Mr. George C. Squires, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court: [301]

This is a bill in equity filed by the appellee, who was complainant below, a corporation of Indiana, and a citizen of that State, for the purpose of enforcing a mechanics' lien under the laws of Minnesota for the price and value of a certain gas holder, alleged to have been constructed and erected by it upon the premises of the appellant.

The bill avers that on or about the 19th day of February, 1881, at the instance and request of the defendant, the plaintiff erected and constructed for the defendant one telescopic gas holder, at the City of Minneapolis, Minnesota, at the agreed price of $9,070; and that said gas holder was in all things manufactured, put up, and erected in a good, substantial and workmanlike manner, and was reasonably worth said sum of $9,070; that the defendant also agreed to pay the plaintiff the expense of labor and material expended by the plaintiff in erecting the scaffolding for the construction of said gas holder, and that said cost was the sum of $188.25, and that said gas holder was erected upon certain described real estate belonging to defendant; that the defendant has paid on account of the construction of said gas holder and cost of said scaffolding the sum of $3,792.74, and no more, and demands judgment against the defendant for the sum of $5,415.51, and that such judgment may be decreed to be a lien upon the said gas holder and the lands upon which the same is situated.

The answer admits that the contract price of said gas holder was the sum of $9,070; denies that the defendant agreed to pay for such scaffolding, and denies that said gas holder was worth the sum of $9,070, and avers that the same was of no greater value than the sum of $4,070; avers that the defendant has paid the plaintiff on account of said gas holder, in cash, the sum of $4,953.84; that the defendant delivered the plaintiff coke on account of said gas holder of the value of $1,440.46; denies that said gas holder was erected upon the lands of the defendant, and avers that the same is personal property, and avers that the same was erected and constructed under an express contract, by the terms of which said gas holder was to be constructed in exact accordance with certain plans and specifications which form a part of said contract; avers that said gas holder was not constructed according to said contract or said plans and specifications, or in a good and workmanlike manner; avers that by reason of the same not having been constructed according to said contract, plans and specifications, the same has never been fit for the purpose for which it was built, and has never worked in a manner contemplated by said contract, and has always been an imperfect holder; avers that the difference in value between said holder as constructed and what it would have been if constructed in accordance with said contract is the sum of $5,000; avers that by the terms of said contract it was expressly agreed that the plaintiff should have the iron and other material necessary to build, construct and fully complete [302] said holder in the City of Minneapolis, within sixty days after being notified by the defendant to produce the same, and to fully complete said gas holder on or before the 15th day of November, 1880.

That the defendant notified the plaintiff on or about the first day of July, 1880, that it was ready for it to ship said material, and that the defendant, at great cost, erected and fully completed the tank and building, in which said gas holder was to be placed, on the first day of September, 1880, so far as the defendant had agreed to construct the same, but that the plaintiff, disregarding its contract, did not ship to and produce said material at the City of Minneapolis until the winter of 1880 and 1881, and did not pretend to have completed said holder until the 19th day of February, 1881, and that the defendant has never consented to or waived the breach of said contract, as above alleged; avers that between the 15th day of November, 1880, and the 19th day of February, 1881, the defendant was engaged in the business of manufacturing, furnishing and selling gas to the City [303] of Minneapolis and the citizens thereof, and that, had the plaintiff constructed and completed said gas holder on or before said 15th day of November, 1880, the defendant would have made a large amount of profit upon the gas it could and would have manufactured, furnished and sold between said 15th day of November, 1880, and the 19th day of February, 1881; to wit, the sum of $6,757.89, and that, by reason of said plaintiff not completing said gas holder within the time specified in the contract, the defendant was deprived of such profit and was thereby directly damaged in the sum of $6,757.89; and demands judgment against the plaintiff for the sum of $9,082.19, with interest thereon since the 19th day of February, 1881.

The replication denies all the averments of the answer.

On final hearing the court below found the facts to be as follows:

"On May 28, 1880, the complainant concluded a verbal contract with the defendant for the construction and completion, ready for use, of a telescopic gas holder at Minneapolis, according to certain written specifications furnished by the complainant. The defendant was to notify the complainant when to purchase the sheet iron to be used in manufacturing the holder, and was to have the benefit of any fluctuation in the price of the iron between the date of the contract and the day when notice was given. No time was fixed when the gas holder should be completed ready for use, though the defendant was anxious it should be ready by November 1, 1880, or in the early fall. The contract price was $9,070, and the holder was completed and accepted about February 19, 1881, and has been in part paid for. It is not constructed of the material required by the specifications, and does not fulfill in every respect the requirements of the contract.

"The complainant, by the terms of the contract, was required to erect the gas holder at Minneapolis and complete it ready for use, and this necessitated scaffolding as the work progressed. Although there is a conflict of testimony about furnishing the scaffolding, I am of the opinion that the complainant waived the clause in the original specifications, which required 'the gas company to furnish the necessary scaffolding, etc.' The iron used in the [304] manufacture of the holder is not of the kind and quality called for in the specifications, and the difference in price is three quarters of a cent per pound. The complainant did not furnish guard rails and braces, as required, which were worth about $50, and has not paid for stoves it used during the construction of the holder, which were purchased by the defendant at the price of $61.80. It would also require an expenditure of $10 to properly adjust the holder, which slightly tipped. The defendant has paid on account of construction $8,792.74, to which complainant concedes in addition a credit of $894."

A decree was rendered in favor of the complainant for $3,586.96, with interest from February 19, 1881, being for the amount of the contract price, less deductions on account of payments and the allowances mentioned.

In opposition to the conclusions of the circuit court, the appellant now insists:

1. That, by the terms of the contract between the parties, the gas holder was to have been finished and in place on or before the 15th of November, 1880.

2. That, on account of the delay between that date and February 19, 1881, when the work was completed, the appellant was entitled to the profit it would have made on the manufacture and sale of gas during that interval, amounting, as is claimed, to the sum of $6,757.89. The rule for the ascertainment of these profits, as stated and claimed by counsel for the appellant, is as follows:

"Given a fixed number of pipes of given dimensions for conducting the illuminating fluid from a holder of ample storage capacity to a given number of consumers, who desire and are ready to pay for all the gas which the standard pressure can supply during certain hours, and it becomes a mere matter of mathematics to ascertain the precise number of thousand feet which would be thus supplied and sold. It is equally a matter of arithmetic to ascertain the number of feet supplied through the same pipes, with one half or one third the proper pressure. And the difference multiplied by the net profit per thousand feet gives the precise amount lost by the loss of pressure and storage capacity."

It was in testimony on the part of the appel- [305] lant that the gas cost for its manufacture $1.50 per 1,000 feet, and that the Company obtained from its customers $3.50 per 1,000 feet, making a profit of $2 on every 1,000 feet. The assumption was that the whole amount of gas which could have been made by the use of the new gasholder during the period of delay, by the increased pressure, would have been forced through the pipes into consumption, without addition to the number of consumers, and that it would have amounted to the sum mentioned.

3. That a much larger sum than $675, being at the rate of three fourths of a cent per pound on the quantity of iron used, should have been allowed for the difference in value between the gas holder as constructed, and its value if it had been constructed according to the contract; the claim being, under this head, that the contract called for annealed iron, whereas that actually furnished was common iron, and not suitable for the purpose.

We have carefully examined and weighed all the evidence in the case bearing on the facts in dispute. We are clearly of opinion that the contract as made did not fix any time for the completion of the work. On the contrary, it was left indefinite at the time of the making of the contract at the request of the appellant itself, who desired to postpone the time for ordering the iron as long as possible, so that it might get the benefit of any fluctuation in the price. After the final order was given, it is true that the appellant endeavored to hasten the period for the final completion of the work; but there was no subsequent agreement fixing any precise date, and its actual completion, which took place on February 19, 1881, we find to have been within a reasonable time. As, therefore, there was no delay beyond the time fixed for its completion by the proper construction of the terms of the agreement, we are relieved from the necessity of considering the question of the alleged loss of profits.

An allowance was made by the circuit court in the decree of $675 as a difference in value between the gas holder as furnished, and as required by the contract, on account of inferi-[306] ority in the quality of the material used and of the workmanship. We are satisfied, from an examination of the testimony, that this allowance ought not to be increased. There is no sufficient proof that the iron used was not annealed iron.

The decree of the Circuit Court is, therefore, affirmed.

[522] JAMES H. FISHER, Plff. in Err.,
v.
WILFRED CARRICO, Admr. c. t. a. of WILLIAM H. PERKINS, Deceased.

(See S. C. "Fisher v. Perkins," Reporter's ed. 522-527.)

Jurisdiction—review of judgment of state court—highest state court "in which decision could be had"—error to the Superior Court of Kentucky—what record must show.

1. This court cannot review the judgment of a state court unless it is that of the highest court "in which a decision in the suit could be had."
2. The court cannot review a judgment of the Superior Court of Kentucky, where the record does not show affirmatively that an application for the allowance of an appeal to the Court of Appeals of that State was made and refused.

[No. 241.]

Submitted April 20, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Superior Court of the State of Kentucky.

Motion to dismiss. Granted.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. George W. Jolly, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. C. S. Walker, for defendant in error.

This is a writ of error to the Superior Court of the State of Kentucky for the review of a judgment of that court, and the defendant, although uniting with the plaintiff in submitting the case for hearing on its merits, has moved to dismiss the writ for want of jurisdiction, because the superior court is not the highest court of the State in which a decision in the suit could be had. The record shows a suit by W. H. Perkins against James H. Fisher in the Circuit Court of Daviess County for the recovery of money and a judgment therein for Fisher. Afterwards this judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeals of the State, and the cause remanded for further proceedings. When the case got back to the circuit court additional pleadings were filed and a trial had, which resulted in a judgment in favor of Perkins for less than $1,000. From this judgment Fisher appealed to the court of appeals. Before this appeal was decided the Superior Court of the State was organized, and the case was transferred, in due course of law, to that court for decision.

Those parts of the Act establishing the superior court, which relate to the appellate jurisdiction of the court of appeals for the review of its judgments, are as follows:

"Sec. 5. The court of appeals shall have appellate jurisdiction over the final orders and judgments of the superior court in all cases except the following: 1. Those for fines or for the recovery of money or personal property where the amount of the fine, or the value in controversy, is less than one thousand dollars, exclusive of interest and costs. 2. Those where the judgment of the lower court had been affirmed by the superior court without a dissenting vote. But if, in any case coming within either of the above exceptions, any two of the judges of the superior court shall certify that, in their opinion, the question involved is novel, and is one of sufficient importance, the party against whom the decision was rendered shall be entitled to take the same by appeal to the court of appeals as in other cases.

"Sec. 6. If an appeal shall be taken to the [524] court of appeals of which the superior court has jurisdiction, or, if taken to the superior court when the court of appeals has jurisdiction, it shall not be dismissed, but shall be transferred to the court having jurisdiction.

"Sec. 7. All appeals from the superior court to the court of appeals shall be prayed and granted in the superior court. But no appeal shall be granted after six months from the time the right to appeal first accrued, unless the party applying therefor was a defendant in the original action, and an infant not under coverture, or of unsound mind, or a prisoner who did not appear by his attorney, in which cases an appeal may be granted to such parties or their representatives within twelve months after their death, or the removal of their disabilities, whichever may first occur." Acts 1881, p. 118.

The judgment of the circuit court was affirmed by the superior court "without a dissenting vote;" and for the review of that judgment of affirmance this writ of error was brought, no application having been previously made to the superior court for the allowance of an appeal to the court of appeals.

This court has no power to review any other judgments of the courts of a State than those of the highest court "in which a decision in the suit could be had." Sec. 709, Rev. Stat. The court of appeals is the highest court of the State of Kentucky, and consequently, until it has been made to appear affirmatively on the face of the record that a decision in this suit could not have been had in that court, we are not authorized to review the judgment of the superior court. Although the value in controversy is less than $1,000, and the judgment of the inferior court was affirmed by the superior court without a dissenting vote, an appeal did lie to the court of appeals if two of the judges of the superior court certified that, in their opinion, the question involved was novel and of sufficient importance.

[526] To get an appeal from the superior court in any case an application therefor must be made to and granted by that court. Such is the express provision of section 7 of the Act under which the court was organized. Certainly it would not be claimed that a judgment of the superior court could be reviewed by this court in a case not within the exceptions mentioned in section 5, before an application had been made in proper time for the allowance of an appeal, and the application refused for some sufficient reason. It is true that in this particular case the prayer for an appeal could not have been granted, unless the necessary certificate was given; but if given, it would have been as much the duty of the court to make the order of allowance as it would if the value in controversy had exceeded $1,000 or the judgment of affirmance had been with a dissenting vote. Such a certificate enters into and forms part of the allowance of an appeal in a case like this, and an application for the allowance necessarily includes an application for the certificate, unless it has been obtained before, because the certificate is one of the ingredients of an allowance. The want of a certificate is good reason for refusing to allow an appeal; but until it has been asked for and refused its absence furnishes no ground for a writ of error from this court.

The principle on which this case rests is illustrated by what was decided in Gregory v. McVeigh, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 294 [23: 156]. In Virginia, the Supreme Court of Appeals is the highest court of the State. Judgments of the Corporation Court of Alexandria can only be taken there for review on leave of the Court of Appeals itself or some judge thereof. Gregory, against whom a judgment had been rendered in the corporation court, applied to each and every one of the judges of the court of appeals for a writ of error; but his applications were all rejected because the judgment was "plainly right." This, by a statute of Virginia, was a bar to any application to the court for the same purpose; and Gregory thereupon sued out a writ of error from this court to the corporation court, as the highest court of the State in which a decision in the suit could be had. Upon a motion to dismiss we upheld our jurisdiction, because everything had been done that could be to take the [527] case to the court of appeals, and its doors had "been forever closed against the suit, not through neglect, but in the regular order of proceeding under the law governing the practice." Had the court itself refused the leave upon an application for that purpose, its refusal would have been equivalent to a judgment of affirmance, which could have been reviewed in this court; but as in the regular course of proceeding that had been done which prevented either a review of a judgment of the court of appeals or an application to that court for a writ of error, the judgment of the corporation court had become the judgment of the highest court of the State in which a decision in that suit could be had, and consequently was reviewable here as such.

So, here, if an application to the superior court for an appeal had been refused, the doors of the court of appeals would have been closed against the suit, and we could have proceeded accordingly. As it is, we find nothing in the record to show that the suit could not have been taken to the court of appeals if the necessary application had been made, and, consequently we have no right to proceed. It matters not that the judgment of the superior court is in accordance with what was decided by the court of appeals on the former appeal. The judgment is still the judgment of the superior court, which is not the highest court of the State, and it might have been taken to the court of appeals for review if the grant of an appeal had been applied for and secured. McComb v. Comrs. of Knox Co. 91 U. S. 1 [23:185]; Kimball v. Evans, 93 U. S. 320 [23: 920]; Davis v. Crouch, 94 U. S. 517 [24: 282]. We are not to assume that an appeal would not have been granted if applied for. The record must show its refusal.

The motion to dismiss is granted.

NEW PROCESS FERMENTATION COMPANY, Appt., [413]

v.

MAGDALENA MAUS, ALBERT C. MAUS, FRANK A. MAUS, AND MATHIAS MAUS.

(See S. C., Reporter's ed. 413-423.)

Patent law—claim for a process—state of art of brewing beer—infringement.

1. The third claim of letters patent No. 215879 for an "improvement in processes for making beer," (p. 1197, post), is a valid claim for the process covered by it and described in the specification.

2. In the case presented the evidence shows beyond doubt that the defendants have used the process covered by said claim of the patent.

Argued May 9, 10, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana. Opinion below, 20 Fed. Rep. 728. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Ephraim Banning, Wells W. Leggett and Thomas A. Banning, for appellant.

Mr. Charles P. Jacobs, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana, by the New Process Fermentation Company, an Illinois corporation, against Magdalena Maus, Albert C. Maus, Casper J. Maus, Frank A. Maus, and Mathias A. Maus, for the infringement of letters patent No. 215679, granted May 20, 1879, to George Bartholomae, as assignee of Leonard Meller and Edmund Hofmann, as inventors, for an "improvement in processes for making beer," subject to the limitation prescribed by section 4887 of the Revised Statutes, by reason of the invention's having been patented in France, November 30, [414] 1876, and in Belgium, February 28, 1877. The specification and drawing and claims of the patent are as follows:

"To all whom it may concern:

"Be it known that we, Leonard Meller, of Ludwigshafen-on-the-Rhine, in the State of Bavaria, and Edmund Hofmann, of Mannheim, in the State of Baden, Germany, have invented certain new and useful improvements in the art of making beer, and we hereby declare the following to be a full, clear, and exact description thereof, reference being had to the accompanying drawing, making a part of this specification, in which the figure represents an end view of our apparatus, with the water column in section.

"Heretofore, in brewing beer, after cooking and cooling, the beer has been put into open vessels to ferment. The fermentation lasts, say fifteen days, and then the beer is drawn off from the yeast into large casks nearly closed, where it remains from one to six months to settle, and among the sediment there will still remain some yeast. The beer is then pumped into shavings casks and is mixed with young beer (kraeusen), which starts a mild fermentation, lasting from ten to fifteen days, until the generation of the gas is reduced to a minimum. During this fermentation the beer effervesces through means of the carbonic acid gas rising, and the lighter particles of yeast and solid matter are thrown to the top, forming a foam, which, during the ebullition, runs over the edges of the opening in the cask, and carrying along a small portion (more or less) of the beer, which is wasted, and this waste has to be replaced by refilling with new beer daily. This wastage we estimate, from practical experience in the manufacture, to be about one barrel in every forty, more or less. This waste beer, running down around the casks and on the floor of the cellars, sours and produces a mildew, which impregnates the air with foul vapors highly injurious to the workmen, and, permeating the beer in the casks, alters its flavor and, in instances where the mildew penetrates the wood of casks, spoils the beer entirely. This fouling of the barrels requires that they should be washed outside, from time to time, and the water used in this washing always [416] raises the temperature of the cellar, and wastes the ice which is therein packed to keep the temperature about 41° Farenheit. After the beer has been in the shavings cask from ten to fifteen days, the gelatine or other clarifying medium is introduced, and at the end of a couple of days the beer is entirely clear. The shavings cask is then bunged up tightly for from three to five days, to confine the last portions of the rising carbonic acid gas. This charges the beer with carbonic acid gas (CO_2), so as to make it merchantable, and it must be drawn off at once into kegs and used; otherwise, the pressure on the shavings cask may burst it.

"In selecting the time for drawing off the beer from the shavings casks into the kegs, to send it to market, the beer should never be under a pressure of over seven pounds to the square inch; otherwise, the keg fills with foam in the drawing off, and the bubbles subsiding leave an air space over the liquid beer, which absorbs a portion of the carbonic acid gas and soon leaves the beer in the keg flat. As the art is now practiced, arriving at the proper degree of pressure when to put the beer in kegs is merely a matter of judgment or guess by the foreman, and no two shavings casks will be drawn off at precisely the same pressure, and the effervescing qualities of the beer will vary considerable, much to the detriment of sales by the brewer. If the beer is not put in market at once at this stage, the bungs have to be removed from the casks and the gas allowed to escape. Then the escaping gas stirs up the yeast and impurities that have settled to the bottom, and the beer has to go again through the entire shavings cask step in the process.

"Under the processes now in use, it requires about twenty days to put beer on the market after it is pumped into the shavings casks. This delay requires brewers to keep a large amount of capital invested during the time in unfinished beer, and it is highly important to decrease this time of preparation.

"The essential features of our invention have been patented in foreign countries as follows: France, to Leo. Meller & Co., filed September 28, 1876, allowed and countersigned, Paris, [417] November 30, 1876, No. 114737; Belgium, to Leo. Meller & Co., filed February 14, 1877, allowed and countersigned, Bruxelles, February 28, 1877, No. 41517.

"The object of our invention is to overcome the difficulties above named, and also to produce in a shorter time a better quality of beer, containing more sugar and less alcohol.

"Our invention consists in treating the beer when in the shavings cask step of the process, in one or more closed casks, under automatically controllable carbonic acid gas pressure, generated either by the mild fermentation of the beer or artificially. This equalizes the pressure in such cask or series of casks; and the effervescing quality of the beer in all the casks, when two or more are connected together, is uniform.

"The cask or casks being closed, none of the beer wastes by running over, and the foul smells and washing of the casks and cellars are avoided. The escaping carbonic acid gas is conducted from the relief valve to the open air, and does not settle in the brewing cellars, to endanger life.

"Our invention consists, further, in similarly treating the beer when in the 'kraeusen' stage, or subsequently thereto, or both, or when in the settling casks ('ruh-beer'), this being the second fermenting stage—that is to say, our invention consists in so treating the beer at any time or times previous to racking off and bunging or bottling.

"In order that those skilled in the art may make and use our invention, we will proceed to describe the manner in which we have carried it out:

"In the drawings A A are shavings casks, having faucets a a, provided with valves i i, inserted tightly in their bungs. These faucets are connected to taps N on the main pipe a', by means of flexible sections k, provided with couplings. The taps or connections have valves i' i'. Pipe a' bends upward and passes above the level of a water column, C, and then, passing downward, enters the base of the column at x, where it is provided with a cock b'. The water column or vessel C has a faucet, d, to draw off water, when desired to decrease the pressure. A depending branch pipe, e, and cock, e', serve to discharge any condensed moisture from pipe a, and a pressure gauge, [418] e², serves to indicate the pressure.

"By means of a gas generator located at A and connected to pipe a by means of pipe f, having cock g, we are enabled to test the joints of the apparatus and drive all atmospheric air from the pipes when the operation begins.

"At the top of the water column is a conical cap terminating in a pipe, E, which is projected out of the building and leads all the gas into the open air. Located within this cap is a conical diaphragm, C', centrally located, so that, should the escape of the gas become so rapid as to lift the body of water upward, the water will be arrested by the diaphragm, while the gas escapes around its edges.

"It is evident that the pressure in all the shavings casks connected with pipe a' will be equal, and will be kept so indefinitely by means of the water column, and, as far as the enlivening of the beer is concerned, it is always ready for market, be it ten days or four months; whereas, in processes now practiced beer has to be bunged at a particular time for a particular day's market.

"Our process enables the brewer to keep on hand merchantable beer, which can be shipped instantly; or, if trade decreases, it enables him to keep his stock on hand without deterioration till the demand is made for it.

"All that has been said above in relation to a series of casks applies, of course, equally to treatment in a single cask.

"It is obvious that means other than a water column may be adopted for equalizing the pressure of the gas, without departing from the spirit of our invention—as, for example, safety valves and the like—and the apparatus is susceptible of many other variations without affecting the process itself, which constitutes the essence of our invention.

"By using our process we are enabled to clarify the beer and clear it of impurities in eight days or less; whereas, in the ordinary process it takes from twelve to twenty days. This immense gain in time we ascribe to the following action: the air being forced out of the pipes, the carbonic acid fills them and the space in the casks above the beer. Then the gas slowly accumulates in the space above the beer [419] until the pressure above is such as to overcome the density of the beer and re-enter it, so as to charge it up to the pressure for which the column is set. This creates, in a manner, an equilibrium between the rising bubbles and the pressure above, during which gravity can act rapidly on the yeast and impurities in the beer and carry them down among the shavings at the bottom of the cask, where they remain.

"We introduce the clarifying gelatine into the shavings casks after the beer is introduced, and before connecting with pipe a'; and actual practice has demonstrated to us that to clarify the beer by our process requires only about one half of the gelatine heretofore used. This saving, together with the saving of the waste beer heretofore mentioned (one or more barrels in every forty), and the saving of labor, will greatly cheapen the production of beer.

"When we desire to make beer for bottling, we attach our apparatus to the settling casks filled with beer, and no young beer (kraeusen) is added, but a little gelatine is added and the beer allowed to remain for from fourteen to twenty days, until it becomes 'lively' (saturated with CO_2), and it is then bottled.

"We find that bottled beer prepared this way is healthier, and will last in good condition two or three months; whereas, the beer bottled in the usual manner with kraeusen beer lasts only for eight or ten days, if pure and not steamed after bottling, the latter spoiling the aroma and flavor.

"Having thus described our invention, what we claim as new, and desire to secure by letters patent, is:

1. The process of preparing beer for the market, which consists in holding it under controllable pressure of carbonic acid gas when in the 'kraeusen' stage, substantially as set forth.

"2. The process of treating beer when in the kraeusen stage, which consists in holding it in a vessel under automatically controllable pressure of carbonic acid gas, substantially as described.

[420] "3. The process of preparing and preserving beer for the market, which consists in holding it under controllable pressure of carbonic acid gas from the beginning of the kraeusen stage until such time as it is transferred to kegs and bunged, substantially as described.

"4. The method herein described of preserving beer in a marketable condition after it has passed the kraeusen stage, which consists in holding it under pressure of carbonic acid gas, said pressure being automatically regulated by a counteracting, hydrostatic pressure, substantially as described.

"5. The process of treating beer when in the second fermenting stage ('ruh-beer'), which consists in holding it under automatically controllable pressure of carbonic acid gas, substantially as described.

"6. The process of treating beer in the course of its manufacture, which consists in holding it in closed connected vessels under automatically controlled pressure of carbonic acid gas, substantially as described.

"7. The process of clarifying and settling beer in a series of shavings casks, and equalizing the rate of fermentation in all of them, whereby the beer is more rapidly and thoroughly clarified, and will be ready for racking off in all the casks at the same time, and can be kept so, which consists in holding the beer in closed connected shavings casks under automatically controlled low pressure of carbonic acid gas, substantially as described.

"8. Casks A A, provided with cocks a a, flexible sections k, and taps N N, in combination with main pipe d, water column C, and pressure gauge e^5, all constructed, arranged, and operated as and for the purposes set forth."

Infringement is alleged of claims 1, 2, 3, 4, 6 and 7. The circuit court dismissed the bill, and the plaintiff has appealed.

The principal contest in the case is as to the validity of the patent, as a patent for a process. The state of the art of brewing beer, so far as it concerns the invention of the patentees, is set forth in the specification. That invention, so far as it is applicable to what is called the kraeusen stage of beer, is applicable to the beer after it is pumped into the shavings casks, and the kraeusen beer is added for the purpose of starting a mild fermentation. By the old process the fermentation lasted from ten to fifteen [421] days, until the generation of the gas was reduced to a minimum. By the rising of the carbonic acid gas through the effervescence of the beer, a foam was formed, which ran over the edges of the open bung hole and wasted more or less of the beer, say one barrel in every forty. This waste beer soured and mildewed, produced foul vapors injurious to health, altered the flavor of the beer in the casks, and sometimes spoiled it entirely. The washing of the barrels on the outside was required, the temperature of the cellar was raised by the use of the water for the washing, and the ice was wasted which was packed in the cellar to keep the temperature at about 41° Fahrenheit. After the beer had been in the shavings casks from ten to fifteen days, gelatine or some other clarifying medium was introduced, and at the end of a couple of days the beer was entirely clear. The shavings cask was then bunged up tightly for from three to five days, to confine the last portions of the rising carbonic acid gas, and charge the beer with it to make it merchantable. The proper degree of pressure in the shavings cask at which to draw off the beer into kegs for market was a matter of judgment in the workman. If the pressure was over seven pounds to the square inch, the keg filled with foam in drawing it off and the bubbles subsiding left an air space over the liquid beer, which absorbed a portion of the carbonic acid gas, and soon left the beer in the keg flat. As a result of the fact that the proper degree of pressure was merely a matter of judgment, no two shavings casks were drawn off at precisely the same pressure, and the effervescing qualities of the beer would vary considerably. If the beer was not put into market at once, at the proper stage, the bungs had to be removed from the shavings casks and the gas allowed to escape. The escaping gas then stirred up the yeast and impurities which had settled at the bottom, and the beer had to go again through the entire shavings cask stage in the process. It required about twenty days to put beer on the market after it was pumped into the shavings casks. This delay required brewers to keep a large amount of capital invested during the time in unfinished beer, and [422] a decrease of this time of preparation was highly important.

Upon these premises, the object of the invention of the patentees was to overcome the difficulties above named. In this view, the statement of the invention in the specification is in these words: "Our invention consists in treating the beer when in the shavings cask step of the process in one or more closed casks under automatically controlled carbonic acid gas pressure, generated either by the mild fermentation of the beer or artificially. This equalizes the pressure in such cask or series of casks, and the effervescing quality of the beer in all the casks, when two or more are connected together, is uniform. The cask or casks being closed, none of the beer wastes by runnning over, and the foul smells and washing of the casks and cellars are avoided. The escaping carbonic acid gas is conducted from the relief valve to the open air, and does not settle in the brewing cellars, to endanger life." This is fairly to be read as a statement that the beer is to be thus treated during the whole of its subjection to the shavings cask stage of the process, whether in one closed cask or in two or more closed casks connected together. The statement is that the cask or casks are to be closed, that is, closed throughout the shavings cask stage of the process, and kept during that process under automatically controllable carbonic acid gas pressure, generated either by the mild fermentation of the beer or artificially. It is also stated that none of the beer wastes by running over, and that the foul smells and washing of the casks and cellars are avoided, and that the escaping carbonic acid gas is conducted to the open air. These consequences cannot follow, nor can the advantages of the invention set forth be fully availed of, unless the casks are closed from the beginning of the shavings cask kraeusen stage. Adequate means for working this process and securing this result are set forth in the specification; also, means for connecting together a series of shavings casks, so as to secure equal pressure in all of them.

The specification further says: "By using our process we are enabled to clarify the beer and clear it of impurities in eight days or less; whereas, in the ordinary process it takes from twelve to twenty days. This immense gain in time we ascribe to the following action: the air being forced out of the pipes, the carbonic acid fills them and the space in the casks above [423] the beer. Then the gas slowly accumulates in the space above the beer until the pressure above is such as to overcome the density of the beer and re-enter it, so as to charge it up to the pressure for which the column is set. This creates, in a manner, an equilibrium between the rising bubbles and the pressure above, during which gravity can act rapidly on the yeast and impurities in the beer and carry them down among the shavings at the bottom of the cask, where they remain.

"We introduce the clarifying gelatine into the shavings casks after the beer is introduced, and before connecting with pipe d; and actual practice has demonstrated to us that to clarify the beer by our process requires only about one half of the gelatine heretofore used. This saving, together with the saving of the waste beer heretofore mentioned (one or more barrels in every forty), and the saving of labor, will greatly cheapen the production of beer."

The third claim of the patent is as follows: "3. The process of preparing and preserving beer for the market, which consists in holding it under controllable pressure of carbonic acid gas from the beginning of the kraeusen stage until such time as it is transferred to kegs and bunged, substantially as described." This claim covers the real invention of the process of the patentees, if it be their invention and be patentable as a process.

The circuit court, in its opinion (20 Fed. Rep. 725, 735), held that the most that could be claimed by the patentees was that they applied the controllable pressure, created by the carbonic acid gas in a state of fermentation, at an earlier stage than was before known; that the essential parts of the apparatus used were known before; that the same controllable pressure had been applied at various stages of the manufacture; that the application at one stage of the condition of the beer instead of another would seem not to involve anything more than a mere mechanical change, which could be employed by anyone skilled in the art; and that the claim of the patent for a particular [424] process, irrespective of the mechanical devices claimed (which the defendants had not used), could not be sustained. But we think that in this view the court erred, and that the third claim of the patent is a valid claim for the process covered by it and described in the specification. The testimony is very full and clear that, as a process, it was not known or used before in the art of making beer; that it worked a valuable and important change in that art, in the particulars set forth in the specification; that it went at once extensively into use, both in Europe and in the United States; and that it was recognized as a new and valuable invention, in published works on the subject, immediately after it was made known.

Professor Haines, the leading expert for the plaintiff, says: "The Meller and Hofmann system accomplishes, in my opinion, many results which had not before been obtained, and it acts, in doing so, in this way: automatically regulated pressure is applied to the casks during the process of active fermentation, and air is thereby, of course, excluded. Under this increased pressure and the exclusion of air, fermentation takes place more regularly, and the impurities in the beer settle more rapidly. By the exclusion of the air, moreover, fewer impurities are produced, for it is a demonstrated fact that, when oxygen is excluded from a fermenting mixture, fewer yeast cells and other solids are generated. Not only is there, therefore, produced less matter to subside, but by the increased pressure these particles are rendered specifically heavier, and therefore settle much more rapidly. The process, therefore, if applied during the stage of active fermentation, not only regulates the fermentation, but will materially hasten the clarifying of the beer, both of which are objects not obtained, so far as I know, by any previously used process or apparatus."

The invention of the patentees covered by claim 3 is, as stated before, applicable to the beer in the kraeusen stage in the shavings casks. The shavings in these casks are thin strips of white beech, hazel nut, or other suitable wood, placed lengthwise of the cask, on its bottom, [425] opposite the bunghole, and used as a fining medium. Being porous, they absorb the turbid ingredients in the beer, and also mechanically arrest them, when precipitated. The kraeusen beer which is added to the contents of the shavings casks, to produce fermentation, is young beer, in full fermentation, the beer or wort to which the kraeusen beer is added in the shavings casks being itself comparatively flat and not clarified.

Vent bungs of various descriptions existed before, but were used towards the last stage of the fermentation of the beer in the kraeusen stage in the shavings casks, to confine mechanically the very last of the slowly generating gas, the valve or vent in the bung operating to prevent over pressure or "over bunging," in case there should be delay in drawing off the beer after it became ready for market. The effect of the accumulation of the carbonic acid gas generated in the later stages of the fermentation was and is to impart more effervescence to the beer. The invention of the patentees is entirely independent of the old and well known vent bungs, and of any prior apparatus for preventing over bunging. It is for the process of bunging the cask simultaneously with the commencement of the active fermentation of the beer in the kraeusen stage. It utilizes the gas to clarify the beer, the pressure of the gas causing the impurities quickly and permanently to deposit themselves on the bottom and sides of the cask, instead of being removed, as in the old method, by overflowing and slow deposit. Professor Haines says: "The novelty and characteristic feature of the process, by which its excellent results are produced, chiefly arises from its introducing an automatically acting process at an earlier stage of the preparation of beer than has been practiced by other devices. This earlier bunging produces a number of valuable results, one of the most valuable of which is the rapid clarification of the beer. By placing the actively fermenting liquid under adequate, automatically controlled pressure, and keeping it thus under pressure until drawn off for use, the beer ferments more equably, less sediment is produced, and clarification is more rapid and more certain. It is, then, as I understand it, not the mechanical application of pressure, but the application [426] of a suitable pressure, beginning with the second active fermentation of the beer and continuing to the close, that constitutes the most valuable and novel feature of this process."

Dr. Ruschhaupt, another expert witness for the plaintiff, says: "It is an acknowledged fact that the influence of pressure upon a compressible object suspended in a liquid causes it to sink, and also that pressure in closed vessels is propagated to all sides with the same force. For this reason an ascending or rising of the insoluble impurities cannot take place as long as the pressure continues or increases; however, as soon as the pressure is released or diminished, a rising must necessarily result. With beer especially such rising easily occurs, and the lighter impurities will almost at once be drawn into the beer again. Any apparatus which does not allow the pressure to become diminished at any time during the operation, and which is not apt to get out of order or become clogged, like a hydrostatic column, will avoid the drawbacks above referred to, and this object is beyond question fully acomplished by the apparatus patented to Meller and Hofmann. It is not simply a safety valve or vent, but intended to accomplish much more, and to be used, if necessary, in the height of the kraeusen stage. But not in this respect lies the principal advantages of said patent. Its new mode of treatment is the main thing. The patent recommends automatic bunging at an earlier stage of manufacture than before practiced, viz.: during the kraeusen stage, and for an entirely different purpose, viz., to hasten the clarifying and settling of the beer. The patent suggests in this respect a new and different mode of treatment before the beer is clear and settled. The new process is carried into effect by causing the liquid in the cask to be placed under an even and equal pressure of carbonic acid gas, which is uniformly applied and maintained throughout the treatment, up to the very time of racking off the beer, by means of an automatically working valve or weight, regulated at a prefixed standard of about seven pounds to the square inch."

The advantages of the process in practice are [427] thus stated by Mr. Selb, a brewer: "First, I save on a thirty-barrel cask about a barrel and a half of beer; secondly, my beer will not become over bunged; third, in the old mode of treating beer, when the liquid was two to three weeks on shavings, it became a shavings taste, which is not the case under the Meller and Hofmann method. You may keep the beer two months in the latter way. Fourth, it also involves material financial advantages, in this: if the beer is not used at the particular time, it needs not, as of old, be pumped over into other casks to guard against the results of over bunging. There is another most important advantage arising from this early process of bunging. It prevents overflowage and the yeast souring the floors and cellars; and, as the yeast is a plant and continues to grow, the atmosphere becomes corrupted, which reacts on the beer in the cellar."

Contemporary publications give to the patentees the credit of this invention. In the "Manual of Beer Brewing," published at Weimar, in 1877, by Prof. Ladislaus Von Wagner, at pages 728 and 729, Meller's method of treatment, in using carbonic acid gas to clarify beer, is spoken of as successful, and as having been already introduced for four years and spread over the whole European Continent. In a treatise on beer brewing, published at Braunschweig, in 1877, by Dr. Carl Lintner, the invention, as one for putting the beer, when drawn off into casks, immediately under the pressure of pure carbonic acid gas, is ascribed to Meller. In "The American Beer Brewer," published at New York, in June, 1878, by A. Schwartz, the invention is spoken of as one which the writer had seen in 1877 at the brewery of Mr. Hofmann, at Mannheim, in Germany, carried out by a bunging apparatus such as is described in the patent.

Within the rules laid down by this court in Corning v. Burden, 56 U. S. 15 How. 252, 267 [14:683, 690]; in Cochrane v. Deener, 94 U. S. 780, 787, 788 [24:139, 141]; and in Tilghman v. Proctor, 102 U. S. 707, 722, 724, 725 [26: 279, 286], we think that the method or art covered by the third claim of the patent is patentable as a process, irrespective of the apparatus or instrumentality for carrying it out. It is the performing of a series of acts upon the beer in the [428] kraeusen stage, producing new and useful results in the art of making marketable beer. The process consists not in merely applying an apparatus to the cask at some period of the kraeusen stage of the beer, but consists in this: that when the beer has been put into the casks, and the kraeusen beer is added to it, and the apparatus is applied at the beginning of the kraeusen stage, the beer will be kept under a controllable pressure of carbonic acid gas until such time as it is fit to be transferred to the kegs for market, such pressure resulting in the complete and speedy clarification of the beer, although it is in a state of active fermentation in the closed shavings casks, with the incidental results of no loss of beer, no fouling of the casks or the cellar, no alteration of the flavor of the beer, and no danger to the health of the workmen. This is, as was said in Cochrane v. Deener, "A mode of treatment of certain materials to produce a given result," and "an act, or a series of acts, performed upon the subject matter to be transformed and reduced to a different state or thing," and "requires that certain things should be done with certain substances, and in a certain order." It is, therefore, a process or art. The apparatus for carrying out the process is of secondary consequence, and may itself be old, separately considered, without invalidating the patent, if the process be new and produces a new result.

There appears also to be a new principle of action involved in the invention of the patentees. The carbonic acid gas generated by the fermentation in the cask, instead of being allowed to continually ascend, as it does with an open bunghole, keeping the liquid constantly in a turbid state, and overflowing at the bunghole, is made, as stated in the specification, to first accumulate in the space above the beer in the closed cask, until the pressure is such that the gas overcomes the density of the beer, and enters it again, and charges it up to the pressure at which the water column is set, thus creating an equilibrium between the rising bubbles of gas and the pressure above, so that gravity can act on the yeast and impurities, and carry them down so that they will remain with the shavings [429] at the bottom. This is a new use, in the treatment of fermenting beer, of the carbonic acid gas which it generates, and a new method or process of hastening the clarifying and settling of the beer.

This being the proper construction of the third claim of the patent, we are prepared to consider the question of the novelty of the process covered by the claim, in the light in which it has been explained.

The United States patent to George Wallace, No. 62581, granted March 5, 1867, does not exhibit any such process. The apparatus shown in it acted on a directly opposite principle, and was designed to stir up the fermenting medium and accelerate the fermentation and decomposition of mash. Professor Haines says, in regard to it: "I have examined the Wallace patent, and compared it with the process and apparatus of Meller and Hofmann. In my opinion, the two are radically different. The Wallace patent introduces to the bottom of one fermenting tank a pipe which is connected with the upper portion of the other fermenting cask. Now, if any excess of pressure should occur in either cask over what there is in the other, a quantity of carbonic acid gas will be forced to the very bottom of the cask having the smaller pressure, and in this way the yeast and other sediment will be thoroughly stirred up and diffused through the fermenting liquid. This would unquestionably increase the rapidity of fermentation, but it would accomplish exactly the opposite result of what the Meller and Hofmann process contemplates; namely, the forcing down of the sediment, so as to clarify the beer, and not its agitation and dissemination through the fluid. It seems to me, therefore, that the Wallace apparatus and process, as figured and described in patent 62581, would not and could not be used for the same purposes that the Meller and Hofmann process is employed." Dr. Ruschhaupt testifies to the same effect.

The United States patent No. 63636, granted to Thomas R. Hicks, April 9, 1867, the United States patent No. 90349, granted to William Dietrichsen, May 25, 1869, and the United States patent No. 115950, granted to William Gilham, June 13, 1871, do not, any of them, [430] disclose the process of the appellant, of controlling the action of beer in active fermentation in the kraeusen stage, for the purposes of clarification and preparation for market, by means of the controllable pressure of carbonic acid gas. The patent to Gilham is for the production of sparkling wine, by charging the wine under pressure with the carbonic acid gas generated by the wine during the process of fermentation. It does not develop the process of the appellant as applied to beer in the kraeusen stage, nor does it disclose the fact that Gilham knew of the existence of any such process.

The patent to Henry Schlaudeman, No. 204687, of June 11, 1878, the patent to John M. Pfaudler, No. 205572, of July 2, 1878, the patent to Theodore F. Straub, No. 208771, of October 8, 1878, and the patent to Frank Fehr, No. 215596, of May 20, 1879, are later in date than the invention of Meller and Hofmann, and all of them are subsequent in date to the introduction into use of that invention in this country, in July or August, 1877.

The experiments of Clement A. Maus were in September, 1877. The apparatus of Jacob W. Loeper was an automatic vent bung, but it is not shown to have been used in carrying out any such process as that of the appellant. The apparatus of Herman Sturm was manifestly only an experiment, abandoned and given up before the invention of Meller and Hofmann was introduced. It is not satisfactorily shown to have been used on shavings casks with the beer in the kraeusen stage. Dr. Ruschhaupt testifies that the devices of Sturm, all of them, belong to the class of automatic vent bungs used during the last stages of after fermentation; that they were not capable of being used during the kraeusen stage, in shavings casks, because they were constructed to act under a much lower pressure than that spoken of in the patent to Meller and Hofmann; that the one with the mercury gauge was intended to work under a pressure of only about one pound to the square inch, and the others were liable to get out of order by the clogging and rusting of the springs; and that they were only applied to let off the surplus carbonic acid gas from lager beer casks to prevent their bursting. Prof. Haines testifies as follows in regard to the Sturm apparatus: "In my opinion, the forms of apparatus described and figured in the testimony of Gen. Sturm could not be practically applied for the purposes of the Meller and Hofmann [431] process, for the bungs figured and described would certainly become clogged by the foam that is sent upward in considerable quantity during the active fermentation, and, becoming clogged, would either cease to act or else remain permanently open. The other device figured and described contemplates, according to the description, the application of a very trivial pressure, stated by the witness himself as equivalent to about a pound per square inch.

As I before testified, I believe such a trivial pressure would not bring about the effects obtained by the Meller and Hofmann process, although it would be sufficient to charge the beer with a certain amount of gas and prevent the casks from bursting, which, as I understand it, was the object of the apparatus now spoken of. * * * It is difficult to determine, from the testimony of the witness, exactly at what stage of the brewing of the beer the apparatuses were employed; but as he states that they were made in 1860, at which time the treating of beer with kraeusen in shavings casks was not practiced, it is evident that the apparatuses were not intended to be applied during this stage of brewing."

It is testified that the appellant's process of treating beer under the automatically controllable pressure of carbonic acid gas is of great value in the brewing business, and has come into general use and been put up in about eighty breweries, many of which are among the largest in the United States.

There is no doubt whatever that the defendants have used the process covered by the third claim of the patent. One of the defendants, Frank A. Maus, testifies that, in the fall of 1878 or the spring of 1879, the defendants commenced using an apparatus which applies the controllable pressure of carbonic acid gas to the beer in the kraeusen stage; that, as soon as the finings are added to the beer in the shavings casks, they attach the apparatus; that sometimes, however, it is not attached until a day or two after the kraeusen and finings are added; [432] that they keep it attached from eight to twenty days, until the beer is drawn off for the market; that, on an average, they gain about two days by the use of the apparatus; and that they avoid the running over of the foaming yeast through the bung hole.

We have confined our consideration of this case to the third claim of the patent, as that is the one which distinctly embodies the invention of the patentees, and it has been infringed by the defendants. It will be time enough to consider the other process claims, and the eighth claim, in cases involving their infringement, where the third claim is not also infringed. In the present case it appears that the defendants have used "the process of preparing and preserving beer for the market," by "holding it under controllable pressure of carbonic acid gas from the beginning of the kraeusen stage until such time as it is tranferred to kegs and bunged, substantially as described" in the specification of the patent.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded to that court, with a direction to enter a decree establishing the validity of the third claim of the patent, and awarding a perpetual injunction and an account of profits and damages, and to take such further proceedings in the suit as may not be inconsistent with this opinion.

PHILADELPHIA & SOUTHERN MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY, Plff. in Err., [326]
v.
COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 326-347.)

Constitutional law—regulation of interstate commerce—power of Congress—state taxation of gross receipts of steamship company engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, invalid.

1. A State cannot constitutionally impose upon a steamship company, incorporated under its laws, a tax upon its gross receipts derived from the transportation of persons and property by sea, between different States, and to and from foreign countries.
2. The regulation of fares and freights receivable for the transportation of persons and goods between different States and between the States and foreign countries, is within the power of Congress equally with the regulation of such transportation itself.
3. In the case presented, the tax in question cannot be regarded as an income tax.
4. Where a subject of interstate commerce is national in character, or admits of only one uniform system of regulation, the power of Congress is exclusive; and its failure to make express regulations indicates its will that the subject shall be free.
5. If a state statute imposing a tax upon interstate commerce is unconstitutional, it is not cured by including in its provisions subjects within the jurisdiction of the State.

The case of the Philadelphia & Reading R.R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, Bk. 21, criticised.

[No. 206.]

Argued April 7, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Morton P. Henry, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. W. S. Kirkpatrick, Atty-Gen. of Pennsylvania and John F. Sanderson, Deputy Atty-Gen. of Pennsylvania, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case is whether a State can constitutionally impose upon a steamship company, incorporated under its laws, a tax upon the gross receipts of such company derived from the transportation of persons and property by sea, between different States, and to and from foreign countries.

By an Act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, passed March 20, 1877, it was, amongst other things, enacted as follows, to wit:

"That every railroad company, canal company, steamboat company, slackwater navigation company, transportation company, street passenger railway company, and every other company now or hereafter incorporated by or under any law of this Commonwealth, or now or hereafter incorporated by any other State, and doing business in this Commonwealth, and [327] owning, operating, or leasing to or from another corporation or company any railroad, canal, slackwater navigation, or street passenger railway, or other device for the transportation of freight or passengers, or in any way engaged in the business of transporting freight or passengers, and every telegraph company incorporated under the laws of this or any other State, and doing business in this Commonwealth, and every express company, and any palace car and sleeping car company, incorporated or unincorporated, doing business in this Commonwealth, shall pay to the State Treasurer, for the use of the Commonwealth, a tax of eight tenths of 1 per centum upon the gross receipts of said company for tolls and transportation, telegraph business, or express business."

A similar Act was passed by the same Legislature on the 7th of June, 1879.

By the terms of these Acts, returns of the gross receipts are required to be made every six months to the auditor-general, upon which the tax is assessed by him and charged against the company.

Under and by virtue of these Acts, the Auditor-General of the State, in October, 1882, charged the appellant, the Philadelphia & Southern Mail Steamship Company, taxes upon its gross receipts for the years 1877, 1878, 1879, 1880 and 1881, all of which receipts were derived from freight and passage money between the Ports of Philadelphia and Savannah, and in foreign trade from New Orleans, and a small amount for charter parties in the like trade. The tax thus charged against the Company for the five years in question amounted to about $6,500, and, with accumulated interest and penalties, to over $9,000. After serving the account upon the Company, an action was brought for its recovery in the Common Pleas of Dauphin County, at Harrisburg. The defendant pleaded that it was a Steamship Company, "operating sea-going steamships engaged in the business of ocean transportation between different States of the United States and between the United States and foreign countries; and that all the said steamships of the said defendant were duly enrolled or registered under [328] the laws of the United States for the coasting or foreign trade of the United States; and that the gross receipts so returned to the Auditor-General, upon which a tax has been levied by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, were received by defendant for freight and passengers carried in the said steamships on the ocean and on the navigable waters of the United States, between the State of Pennsylvania and other States of the United States, and between the States of the United States and foreign countries, and for the charter and hire of the said steamships to other parties in such trade and business; and that no part of the said gross receipts was received for the transportation of freight and passengers between places within the State of Pennsylvania, or for the hire and use of the said steamships within the State of Pennsylvania."

On the trial of the cause the parties entered into an agreement as to the facts, showing the gross receipts for each year, in each branch of the Company's trade: which facts supported the allegations of the plea. A trial by jury was dispensed with, and the court gave judgment for the Commonwealth for the principal of the tax and interest from the time of commencing suit. Exceptions were taken, on the ground that the judgment was in conflict with the clause of the Constitution of the United States giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign Nations and among the several States. The judgment, being removed by writ of error to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, was affirmed by that court; and its judgment is now before us for review.

The question which underlies the immediate question in the case is whether the imposition of the tax upon the Steamship Company's receipts amounted to a regulation of, or an interference with, interstate and foreign commerce, and was thus in conflict with the power granted by the Constitution to Congress? The tax was levied directly upon the receipts derived by [336] the Company from its fares and freights for the transportation of persons and goods between different States, and between the States and foreign countries, and from the charter of its vessels which was for the same purpose. This transportation was an act of interstate and foreign commerce. It was the carrying on of such commerce. It was that, and nothing else. In view of the decisions of this court, it cannot be pretended that the State could constitutionally regulate or interfere with that commerce itself. But taxing is one of the forms of regulation. It is one of the principal forms. Taxing the transportation, either by its tonnage, or its distance, or by the number of trips performed, or in any other way, would certainly be a regulation of the commerce, a restriction upon it, a burden upon it. Clearly, this could not be done by the State without interfering with the power of Congress. Foreign commerce has been fully regulated by Congress, and any regulations imposed by the States upon that branch of commerce would be a palpable interference. If Congress has not made any express regulations with regard to interstate commerce, its inaction, as we have often held, is equivalent to a declaration that it shall be free, in all cases where its power is exclusive; and its power is necessarily exclusive whenever the subject matter is national in its character and properly admits of only one uniform system. See the cases collected in Robbins v. Shelby Taxing District, 120 U. S. 489, 492, 493 [ante, 694]. Interstate commerce carried on by ships on the sea is surely of this character.

If, then, the commerce carried on by the plaintiff in error in this case could not be constitutionally taxed by the State, could the fares and freights received for transportation in carrying on that commerce be constitutionally taxed? If the State cannot tax the transportation, may it, nevertheless, tax the fares and freights received therefor? Where is the difference? Looking at the substance of things, and not at mere forms, it is very difficult to see any difference. The one thing seems to be tantamount to the other. It would seem to be rather metaphysics than plain logic for the state officials to say to the Company: "We will not tax you for the transportation you perform, but we will tax you for what you get [337] for performing it." Such a position can hardly be said to be based on a sound method of reasoning.

This court did not so reason in the case of Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419 [6: 678]. The State of Maryland required all importers of foreign goods, and other persons selling the same by wholesale, bale or package, to take out a license and pay $50 therefor, subject to a penalty and forfeiture for selling without such license. It was contended on the part of the State that this was a mere tax on the occupation of selling foreign goods, affecting only the person and not the importation of the goods themselves, or the occupation of importing them. Chief Justice Marshall met this objection by showing that the attempt to regulate the sale of imported goods was as much in conflict with the power of Congress to regulate commerce as a regulation of their importation itself would be. "If this power," said he (referring to the power of Congress), "reaches the interior of a State, and may be there exercised, it must be capable of authorizing the sale of those articles which it introduces. Commerce is intercourse; one of its most ordinary ingredients is traffic. It is inconceivable that the power to authorize this traffic, where given in the most comprehensive terms, with the intent that its efficacy should be complete, should cease at the point when its continuance is indispensable to its value. To what purpose should the power to allow importation be given, unaccompanied with the power to authorize a sale of the thing imported? Sale is the object of importation, and is an essential ingredient of that intercourse, of which importation constitutes a part. It is as essential an ingredient, as indispensable to the existence of the entire thing, then, as importation itself. It must be considered as a component part of the power to regulate commerce. Congress has a right, not only to authorize importation, but to authorize the importer to sell. * * * Any penalty inflicted on the importer for selling the article in his character of importer must be in oppposition to the Act of Congress which authorizes importation. * * * The distinction between a tax on the thing imported, and on the person of the importer, can have no influence on this part of the subject. It is too obvious for controversy that they interfere equally with the power to regulate commerce." Pp. 446-448 [688].

The application of this reasoning to the case in hand is obvious. Of what use would it be to the ship owner, in carrying on interstate and foreign commerce, to have the right of transporting persons and goods free from State interference if he had not the equal right to charge for such transportation without such interference? The very object of his engaging in transportation is to receive pay for it. If the regulation of the transportation belongs to the power of Congress to regulate commerce, the regulation of fares and freights receivable for such transportation must equally belong to that power; and any burdens imposed by the State on such receipts must be in conflict with it. To apply the language of Chief Justice Marshall, fares and freights for transportation in carrying on interstate or foreign commerce are as much essential ingredients of that commerce as transportation itself.

It is necessary, however, that we should examine what bearing the cases of the State Freight Tax and Railway Gross Receipts, reported in 15th of Wallace, have upon the question in hand. These cases were much quoted in argument, and the latter was confidently relied on by the counsel of the Commonwealth. They both arose under certain tax laws of Pennsylvania. The first, which is reported under the title of Case of the State Freight Tax, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 232 [21: 146], was that of the Reading Railroad Company, and arose under an Act passed in 1864, which imposed upon every railroad, steamboat, canal and slack water navigation company, a tax of a certain rate per ton on every ton of freight carried by or upon the works of said company; with a proviso directing, in substance, that every company, foreign or domestic, whose line extended partly in Pennsylvania, and partly in another State, should pay for the freight carried over that portion of its line in Pennsylvania, the same as if its whole line were in that State. Under this law the Reading Railroad Company was charged a tax of $38,000 for freight transported to points within Pennsylvania, and of $46,000 for that exported to points without the State. The latter sum the company refused to pay; and the question in this court was whether that portion of the tax was constitutional; and we held that it was not. Mr. Justice Strong delivered the opinion of the court. It was held that this was not a tax upon the franchises of the companies, or upon their property, or upon their business, measured by the number of tons of freight carried; but was a tax upon the freight carried, and because of its carriage; that transportation is a constituent of commerce; that the tax was, therefore, a regulation of commerce, and a regulation of commerce among the States; that the transportation of passengers or merchandise from one State to another is in its nature a matter of national importance, admitting of a uniform system or plan of regulation, and therefore, under the rule established by Cooley v. Port Wardens, 53 U. S. 12 How. 299 [13: 996], exclusively subject to the legislation of Congress. The inevitable conclusion was that the tax then in question was in conflict with the exclusive power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States, and was therefore unconstitutional. Referring to the decision in Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 35 [18: 745], in which this court had decided that a State cannot tax persons for passing through or out of it, Justice Strong said: "If state taxation of persons passing from one State to another, or a state tax upon interstate transportation of passengers, is unconstitutional, a fortiori, if possible, is a state tax upon the carriage of merchandise from State to State in conflict with the Federal Constitution. Merchandise is the subject of commerce. Transportation is essential to commerce; and every burden laid upon it is pro tanto a restriction. Whatever, therefore, may be the true doctrine respecting the exclusiveness of the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce among the States, we regard it as established that no State can impose a tax upon freight transported from State to State, or upon the transporter because of such transportation."

The court in its opinion took notice of the fact that the law was general in its terms, making no distinction between freight transported wholly within the State and that which was destined to, or came from, another State. But it was held that this made no difference. The law might be valid as to one class, and unconstitutional as to the other. On this subject Justice Strong said: "The State may tax its internal commerce; but if an Act to tax interstate or foreign commerce is unconstitutional, it is not cured by including in its provisions subjects within the jurisdiction of the State. Nor is a rule prescribed for carriage of goods through, out of, or into a State, any the less a regulation of transportation because the same rule may be applied to carriage which is wholly internal." This last observation meets the argument that might be made in the present case; namely, that the law is general in its terms, and taxes receipts for all transportation alike, making no discrimination against receipts for interstate or foreign transportation, and hence cannot be regarded as a special tax on the latter. The decision in the case cited shows that this does not relieve the tax from its objectionable character.

If this case stood alone, we should have no hesitation in saying that it would entirely govern the one before us; for, as before said, a tax upon fares and freights received for transportation is virtually a tax upon the transportation itself. But at the same time that the Case of State Freight Tax was decided, the other case referred to; namely, that of State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, was also decided, and the opinion was delivered by the same member of the court. 82 U.S. 15 Wall. 284 [21:164]. This was also a case of a tax imposed upon the Reading Railroad Company. It arose under another Act of Assembly of Pennsylvania, passed in February, 1866, by which it was enacted that, "In addition to the taxes now provided by law, every railroad, canal and transportation company incorporated under the laws of this Commonwealth, and not liable to the tax upon income under existing laws, shall pay to the Commonwealth a tax of three fourths of 1 per centum upon the gross receipts of said company; the said tax shall be paid semi-annually." Under this statute the accounting officers of Pennsylvania stated an account against the Reading Railroad Company for tax on gross receipts of the company for the half year ending December 31, 1867. These receipts were derived partly from the freight of goods transported wholly within the State, and partly [341] from the freight of goods exported to points without the State, which latter were discriminated from the former in the reports made by the company. It was the tax on the latter receipts which formed the subject of controversy. The same line of argument was taken at the bar as in the other case. This court, however, held the tax to be constitutional. The grounds on which the opinion was based, in order to distinguish this case from the preceding one, were two: first, that the tax, being collectible only once in six months, was laid upon a fund which had become the property of the company, mingled with its other property, and incorporated into the general mass of its property, possibly expended in improvements, or otherwise invested. The case is likened, in the opinion, to that of taxing goods which have been imported, after their original packages have been broken, and after they have been mixed with the mass of property in the country, which, it was said, are conceded in Brown v. Maryland [supra] to be taxable.

This reasoning seems to have much force. But is the analogy to the case of imported goods as perfect as is suggested? When the latter become mingled with the general mass of property in the State, they are not followed and singled out for taxation as imported goods, and by reason of their being imported. If they were, the tax would be as unconstitutional as if imposed upon them whilst in the original packages. When mingled with the general mass of property in the State they are taxed in the same manner as other property possessed by its citizens, without discrimination or partiality. We held in Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275 [23:347], that goods brought into a State for sale, though they thereby become a part of the mass of its property, cannot be taxed by reason of their being introduced into the State, or because they are the products of another State. To tax them as such was expressly held to be unconstitutional. The tax in the present case is laid upon the gross receipts for transportation as such. Those receipts are followed and caused to be accounted for by the Company, dollar for dollar. It is those specific receipts, or the amount thereof, which is the same thing, for which the Company is called upon to pay the tax. They are taxed not only [342] because they are money, or its value, but because they were received for transportation. No doubt a shipowner, like any other citizen, may be personally taxed for the amount of his property or estate, without regard to the source from which it was derived, whether from commerce, or banking, or any other employment. But that is an entirely different thing from laying a special tax upon his receipts in a particular employment. If such a tax is laid, and the receipts taxed are those derived from transporting goods and passengers in the way of interstate or foreign commerce, no matter when the tax is exacted, whether at the time of realizing the receipts, or at the end of every six months or a year, it is an exaction aimed at the commerce itself, and is a burden upon it, and seriously affects it. A review of the question convinces us that the first ground on which the decision in State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts was placed is not tenable; that it is not supported by anything decided in Brown v. Maryland, but, on the contrary, that the reasoning in that case is decidedly against it.

The second ground on which the decision referred to was based was that the tax was upon the franchise of the corporation granted to it by the State. We do not think that this can be affirmed in the present case. It certainly could not have been intended as a tax on the corporate franchise, because, by the terms of the Act, it was laid equally on the corporations of other States doing business in Pennsylvania. If intended as a tax on the franchise of doing business, which in this case is the business of transportation in carrying on interstate and foreign commerce, it would clearly be unconstitutional. It was held by this court in the case of Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196 [29:158], that interstate commerce carried on by corporations is entitled to the same protection against state exactions which is given to such commerce when carried on by individuals. In that case the tax was laid upon the capital stock of a ferry company incorporated by New Jersey, and engaged in the business of transporting passengers and freight between Camden, in New Jersey, and the City

[343] of Philadelphia. The law under which the tax was imposed was passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania on the 7th of June, 1879, and declared "That every company or association whatever, now or hereafter incorporated by or under any law of this Commonwealth, or now or hereafter incorporated by any other State or Territory of the United States, or foreign government, and doing business in this Commonwealth", * * * (with certain exceptions named) "shall be subject to and pay into the treasury of the Commonwealth annually a tax to be computed as follows; namely," the amount of tax is then rated by the dividends declared, and imposed upon the capital stock of the company at the rate of so many mills, or fractions of a mill, for every dollar of such capital stock. It was contended that the ferry company could not hold property in Philadelphia for the purpose of carrying on its ferrying business, and could not carry on its said business there, without a franchise, express or implied, from the State of Pennsylvania. But this court held, in its opinion, delivered by Mr. Justice Field, that the business of landing and receiving passengers and freight at the wharf in Philadelphia was a necessary incident to, and a part of, their transportation across the Delaware River from New Jersey; that without it, that transportation would be impossible; that a tax upon such receiving and landing of passengers and freight is a tax upon their transportation, that is, upon the commerce between the two States involved in such transportation; and that Congress alone can deal with such transportation, its nonaction being equivalent to a declaration that it shall remain free from burdens imposed by state legislation. The opinion proceeds as follows: "Nor does it make any difference whether such commerce is carried on by individuals or corporations. Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275 [supra]; Mobile Co. v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691 [26:238]. As was said in Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 108 [19:857], at the time of the formation of the Constitution, a large part of the commerce of [344] the world was carried on by corporations; and the East India Company, the Hudson Bay Company, the Hamburgh Company, the Levant Company and the Virginia Company were mentioned as among the corporations which, from the extent of their operations, had become celebrated throughout the commercial world. The grant of power [to Congress] is general in its terms, making no reference to the agencies by which commerce may be carried on. It includes commerce by whomsoever conducted, whether by individuals or corporations." P. 204 [162]. Again; "While it is conceded that the property in a State belonging to a foreign corporation engaged in foreign or interstate commerce may be taxed equally with like property of a domestic corporation engaged in that business, we are clear that a tax or other burden imposed upon the property of either corporation because it is used to carry on that commerce, or upon the transportation of persons or property, or for the navigation of the public waters over which the transportation is made, is invalid and void as an interference with, and obstruction of, the power of Congress in the regulation of such commerce." P. 211 [164]. It is hardly necessary to add that the tax on the capital stock of the New Jersey Company, in that case, was decided to be unconstitutional, because, as the corporation was a foreign one, the tax could only be construed as a tax for the privilege or franchise of carrying on its business, and that business was interstate commerce.

The decision in this case, and the reasoning on which it is founded, so far as they relate to the taxation of interstate commerce carried on by corporations, apply equally to domestic and foreign corporations. No doubt the capital stock of the former, regarded as inhabitants of the State, or their property, may be taxed as other corporations and inhabitants are, provided no discrimination be made against them as corporations carrying on foreign or interstate commerce, so as to make the tax, in effect, a tax on such commerce. But their business as carriers in foreign or interstate commerce cannot be taxed by the State under the plea that they are exercising a franchise.

There is another point, however, which may properly deserve some attention. Can the tax in this case be regarded as an income tax? And, if it can, does that make any difference as to its constitutionality? We do not think that it can properly be regarded as an income tax. It is not a general tax on the incomes of all the inhabitants of the State, but a special tax on [345] transportation companies. Conceding, however, that an income tax may be imposed on certain classes of the community, distinguished by the character of their occupations, this is not an income tax on the class to which it refers, but a tax on their receipts for transportation only. Many of the companies included in it may, and undoubtedly do, have incomes from other sources, such as rents of houses, wharves, stores, and water power, and interest on moneyed investments. As a tax on transportation, we have already seen, from the quotations from the State Freight Tax Case, that it cannot be supported where that transportation is an ingredient of interstate or foreign commerce, even though the law imposing the tax be expressed in such general terms as to include receipts from transportation which are properly taxable. It is unnecessary, therefore, to discuss the question which would arise if the tax were properly a tax on income. It is clearly not such, but a tax on transportation only.

The corporate franchises, the property, the business, the income of corporations created by a State may undoubtedly be taxed by the State; but in imposing such taxes care should be taken not to interfere with or hamper, directly or by indirection, interstate or foreign commerce, or any other matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. This is a principle so often announced by the courts, and especially by this court, that it may be received as an axiom of our constitutional jurisprudence. It is unnecessary, therefore, to review the long list of cases in which the subject is discussed. Those referred to are abundantly sufficient for our purpose. We may add, however, that since the decision of the Railway Tax Cases now reviewed, a series of cases has received the consideration of this court, the decisions in which are in general harmony with the views here expressed, and show the extent and limitations of the rule that a State cannot regulate or tax the operations or objects of interstate or foreign commerce. We may refer to the following: R. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465 [24: 527]; Cook v. Pa. 97 U. S. 566 [24: 1015]; Guy v. Baltimore, 100 U. S. 434 [346] [25: 743]; Webber v. Va. 103 U. S. 344 [26: 565]; Moran v. New Orleans, 112 U. S. 69 [28: 653]; Walling v. Mich. 116 U. S. 446 [29: 691]; Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34 [29: 785]; Wabash etc. R. R. Co. v. Ill. 118 U. S. 557 [ante, 244]; Robbins v. Shelby County, 120 U. S. 489 [ante, 694]; Fargo v. Mich. 121 U. S. 230 [ante, 888]. The cases of Moran v. New Orleans and Fargo v. Michigan are especially apposite to the case now under consideration. As showing the power of the States over local matters incidentally affecting commerce, see Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 123 [24: 83], and other cases in the same volume, pp. 161, 176, 180 [95, 98, 99], as explained by Wabash etc. R. R. Co. v. Illinois; Wharfage Cases, viz.: Keokuk etc. Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 80 [24: 377]; 100 U. S. 428 [25: 690]; 105 U. S. 568 [26: 1171]; 107 U. S. 698 [27: 587]; 121 U. S. 444 [ante, 976]; Mobile Co. v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691 [26: 238]; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 630 [29: 257, 260]; R. R. Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 307 [29: 636]; Coe v. Errol, Id. 517 [29: 715].

It is hardly within the scope of the present discussion to refer to the disastrous effects to which the power to tax interstate or foreign commerce may lead. If the power exists in the State at all, it has no limit but the discretion of the State, and might be exercised in such a manner as to drive away that commerce, or to load it with an intolerable burden, seriously affecting the business and prosperity of other States interested in it; and if those States, by way of retaliation, or otherwise, should impose like restrictions, the utmost confusion would prevail in our commercial affairs. In view of such a state of things which actually existed under the Confederation Chief Justice Marshall, in the case before referred to, said: "Those who felt the injury arising from this state of things, and those who were capable of estimating the influence of commerce on the prosperity of Nations, perceived the necessity of giving the control over this important subject to a single government. It may be doubted whether any of the evils proceeding from the feebleness of the Federal Government contributed more to that great revolution which [347] introduced the present system, than the deep and general conviction that commerce ought to be regulated by Congress It is not, therefore, matter of surprise that the grant should be as extensive as the mischief, and should comprehend all foreign commerce, and all commerce among the States. To construe the power so as to impair its efficacy would tend to defeat an object, in the attainment of which the American public took, and justly took, that strong interest which arose from a full conviction of its necessity." Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 446 [6: 688].

Nothing can be added to the force of these words.

Our conclusion is that the imposition of the tax in question in this cause was a regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, in conflict with the exclusive powers of Congress under the Constitution.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania is therefore reversed, and the cause is remanded, to be disposed of according to law, in conformity with this opinion.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment, brought by Wisner, the plaintiff in error, against the defendants in error, for a lot of land in Isabella County, [216] Michigan. The plaintiff claims the land as purchaser from one Gillette, assignee in bankruptcy of Alfred Willey. The defendants claim the same under a number of tax sales, and a deed from Willey, the bankrupt. It appeared on the trial that Willey filed his petition in bankruptcy September 19, 1871, in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan, and set forth, in the schedule thereto annexed, the land in question (with other lands) as his property; and it was shown that he had purchased it several years before. He was decreed a bankrupt September 3, 1872, and Gillette was appointed his assignee February 21, 1873. On the third day of April, 1880, more than seven years after his appointment, Gillette filed a petition in the district court, praying for leave to sell the land in question and the several other lots mentioned in the schedule at private sale for any sum not less than $100. The petition alleged that Willey, at the time of filing his petition in bankruptcy, claimed an interest in the lands, describing them, and then proceeded as follows:

"Your petitioner, having no funds belonging to said estate in his hands, did not investigate the title of said bankrupt to said land, and believing that said lands were of little value, paid no attention to them until recently, when application was made to your petitioner to purchase the right of said bankrupt in said lands. From examination of the records it appears that the lands have been sold for taxes to private parties for a number of years, beginning in 1867; that the right acquired by virtue of the sale of said lands for delinquent taxes is held by one party; in addition to such title has been obtained a deed from the bankrupt of said lands; that another party has, by virtue of a sale on execution, based upon a judgment obtained against said bankrupt before he was adjudicated a bankrupt, acquired a title to said lands; that the title to said lands is complicated in this manner, both parties claiming to own said lands by virtue of the title they have acquired thereto in the manner above stated; that, from inquiry and examination, your petitioner believes that the title which may be vested in him as assignee of said bankrupt is of but [217] little value without a lengthy litigation, and your petitioner has no funds in his hands to carry on such litigation or pay taxes that may be assessed thereon; that, from information, your petitioner sets forth that said lands were located for the pine timber that originally was on the land, which having been removed the lands were not considered by the bankrupt of sufficient value to pay taxes thereon; that petitioner is offered one hundred dollars for the conveyance of the title which he holds as assignee of the said bankrupt to said lands, and, upon information and belief, your petitioner affirms that said sum is all the interest of said estate in said lands is worth, and that the acceptance of said offer and the conveyance of said title to said lands accordingly would be for the interest of the creditors of the estate of said bankrupt. And your petitioner prays that an order may be made in this case authorizing your petitioner to sell said lands at private sale as he may deem advisable, but not at a less sum than one hundred dollars."

The court, on the 5th of April, 1880, made an order authorizing Gillette, the assignee, to make the sale as proposed by this petition, and the same was made accordingly to the plaintiff in error for the sum of $100, and on the 13th of April, 1880, a deed was given to him by the assignee for the lands.

No notice was given to the adverse claimants of the land, either of the application to the district court for authority to sell, or of the intention to sell the same.

The plaintiff in error, to sustain the action on his part, introduced proof of the proceedings in the bankrupt court, of the title of Willey, and of the deed from the assignee to himself. The defendants, on their part, deduced title to the premises in controversy by virtue of certain deeds made in pursuance of sales for taxes for the years 1867, 1868, and subsequent years; and also by a quitclaim deed from Willey, the bankrupt, to the defendant, Brown, dated September 11, 1875, and duly recorded. The defendants also proved by the testimony of Brown that he had no notice of the proceedings in bankruptcy until after he had obtained the said deed from Willey, nor until after the plaintiff in error had purchased the land from the assignee.

[218] The plaintiff then proposed to go into the validity of the tax titles; but the judge before whom the case was tried, being of opinion that the plaintiff had shown no title, directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant. A bill of exceptions was taken, and the case was carried to the Supreme Court of Michigan by writ of error; and that court affirmed the judgment of the court below. The present writ is brought to review the judgment of the supreme court, on the ground that its decision was against the validity of a title claimed under the laws of the United States; namely, under the proceedings in bankruptcy.

The principal ground on which the Supreme Court of Michigan placed its decision was the want of notice by the assignee to the adverse claimants of the property. The petition of the assignee for authority to sell shows that the title to the land was in dispute, and that the adverse claimants were known to him; but he proceeded without giving them any notice, either of his intended application to the court, or of his intention to sell. The court inferred that notice was required by the 25th section of the Bankrupt Law, section 5063 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that "Whenever it appears to the satisfaction of the court that the title to any portion of an estate, real or personal, which has come into the possession of the assignee, or which is claimed by him, is in dispute, the court may, upon the petition of the assignee, and after such notice to the claimant, his agent or attorney, as the court shall deem reasonable, order it to be sold under the direction of the assignee, who shall hold the funds received in place of the estate disposed of, and the proceeds of the sale shall be considered the measure of the value of the property in any suit or controversy between the parties in any court."

As it is a question of doubt whether section 5063 refers to a case in which only the interest of the bankrupt is ordered to be sold, without attempting to affect the title or interest of other persons, and as there was another ground on which the court of trial might unquestionably have instructed the jury to find a verdict for the defendants, and which also involved a question of the plaintiff's right of action under the bankrupt law, we have deemed it unnecessary [219] to consider the validity of the point on which the case was actually decided. The other ground to which we refer is that of the two years' limitation within which the assignee can bring suit. It is declared by section 5057 of the Revised Statutes, that "No suit at law or in equity, shall be maintainable in any court between an assignee in bankruptcy and a person claiming an adverse interest, touching any property or rights of property transferable to or vested in such an assignee, unless brought within two years from the time when the cause of action accrued for or against such assignee." This Act, as well as the Statute of Limitations of Michigan, was pleaded by the defendants in bar of the action. Now, the assignee in the present case received his appointment on the 15th of February, 1873, and the property in question was at that time adversely held by the defendants under tax sales made by the Auditor-General of the State of Michigan, and continued to be so held until the commencement of this suit. It is clear, therefore, that, from and after the 15th of February, 1875, the assignee himself was precluded by the statute from bringing an action to recover the lands; and he could not, after that time, by selling them to a third person, enable the latter to maintain an action therefor. The sale made by the assignee to the plaintiff in April, 1880, could have no such effect. This point was directly decided in Gifford v. Helms, 98 U. S. 248 [25: 57]. The complainant in that case had purchased the lands from the assignee more than two years after the latter's appointment, and they had been continuously held under an adverse title. In delivering the judgment of the court Mr. Justice Clifford said: "Nothing can be plainer in legal decision than the proposition that the complainant did not acquire, by the conveyance made to him under that sale, any greater rights than those possessed by the grantor;" and in conformity with that conclusion it was held that the complainant, equally with the assignee, his grantor, was bound by the limitation prescribed by the statute; and the bill was accordingly dismissed, without any attention being given to the question of the validity of the sale,—in that case, as in this, there having been, apparently, no notice of the application to sell, although the sale itself was by public auction.

[220] Our conclusion, therefore, is that the instruction to find for the defendants was right, at all events; for they were entitled to such an instruction on the bar of the two years' limitation, whether they were so for the reason assigned by the judge or not.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

WILLIAM E. COLLIER (A. C. Riley) Assignee of BENJ. B. BARNES, a Bankrupt.

Bankruptcy—deed by bankrupt to his children—bill by assignee to cancel and sell for creditors—limitation—validity of deed—rights of assignee—improper schedule of lands in dispute—effect of—credibility of grantor as a witness.

Upon a bill filed by an assignee in bankruptcy in the circuit court, to have a deed by the bankrupt made prior to adjudication in bankruptcy, conveying certain lands to his children, surrendered and the land sold, it is held: that the suit is to be considered, for the purposes of the limitation prescribed by section 5057, R. S., a continuation of a former proceeding instituted by petition in the district court; that the deed was good as between the grantor and his children; that, in the absence of fraud, the assignee cannot question it, as he took only such rights as the bankrupt had; and that the fact that the bankrupt improperly included the lands in question in his schedule, even if not satisfactorily explained, cannot legally affect the rights of his grantees, and is only important as bearing on his credibility as a witness as to the delivery of the deed and the character of his subsequent possession.

Argued April 20, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Georgia. Reversed, Remanded.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Thomas B. Gresham and R. F. Lyon, for appellants.

Mr. N. J. Hammond, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 25th day of September, 1868, Benjamin B. Barnes made his deed conveying to certain of his children several tracts of land in the Counties of Crawford and Houston, in the State of Georgia. The deed was witnessed by three persons—one of whom was a justice of the peace—who certified that it was signed, sealed, and delivered in their presence. It was duly recorded in Crawford County, where most of the lands are, on the 26th of March, 1864; in Houston County, September 30, 1874. [383]

The grantor, upon his own petition, was, March, 1874, adjudged a bankrupt by the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Georgia. His schedule of real estate embraced these lands. He was in the actual possession thereof at the time of filing his petition in bankruptcy.

In June, 1874, immediately after an assignment, in the usual form by the register, of the estate of the bankrupt, his assignee in bankruptcy went into possession of the lands, and thereafter took to himself, as such assignee, the rents and profits thereof.

On the 19th of January, 1876, the assignee filed his petition in the district court, in bankruptcy, setting forth the above facts, and stating that the title to the lands was in dispute between him and the grantees in the deed of September 25, 1868. The petition alleged that the deed was wholly voluntary, and that, from its date to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, the grantor was in the continuous, uninterrupted possession of the lands, using and controlling the same as his property, and enjoying the rents, issues, and profits thereof. The prayer of the assignee was for notice to the claimants as required by section 5063 of the Revised Statutes, and for a sale of the lands, the proceeds to be held to answer any suit which might be instituted by the claimants.

That section of the Revised Statutes provides: "Whenever it appears to the satisfaction of the court that the title to any portion of the estate, real or personal, which has come into possession of the assignee, or which is claimed by him, is in dispute, the court may upon the petition of the assignee and after such notice to the claimant, his agent or attorney, as the court shall deem reasonable, order it to be sold, under the direction of the assignee, who shall hold the funds received in place of the estate disposed of; and the proceeds of the sale shall be considered the measure of the value of the property in any suit or controversy between the parties in any court. But this provision shall not prevent the recovery of the property from the possession of the assignee by any proper action, commenced at any time before the court orders the sale." [384]

The claimants appeared and answered the petition. They asserted title to the property under the deed of 1868, claiming: 1. That the grantor made the deed to his children in good faith, by way of advancement, and without any intent to delay or defraud his creditors, these lands constituting, at the time, an inconsiderable part of his estate, and his other property being largely more than was necessary to meet any indebtedness he then or thereafter had: 2. That the deed was delivered to the grantees by the grantor at or about the time of its execution; 3. That the grantor's possession, at any time thereafter, of the lands, was held for the grantees; 4. That the grantor was entirely solvent when adjudged a bankrupt, and was induced to go into bankruptcy by the fraudulent conduct of others, who, taking advantage of his feeble health, persuaded him into taking that step, and to include these lands in his schedule of real estate. They prayed that the assignee be required to account to them for the rents and profits received by him.

Upon the issues thus made the parties went into proofs, in accordance with the rules of the court. But for reasons not disclosed by the record, the assignee, by leave of the court and without notice to the defendants, withdrew his petition "without prejudice to either party or to any other proceeding he may be advised to institute touching the subject matter of said petition."

In a few days thereafter, to wit, on December 1, 1879, the defendants presented a petition to the district court, sitting in bankruptcy, reciting the foregoing facts and praying that the [385] assignee be required to surrender the possession of the premises to them, and account for rents and profits received by him. To this petition the assignee demurred, for want of jurisdiction in the district court to give the relief asked. No further steps seem to have been taken in that proceeding.

The present suit was commenced by the assignee in the circuit court on the 16th day of December, 1879. Its object is to obtain a decree requiring the surrender by the defendants, of the title deed for these lands, and ordering their sale. The bill sets out, substantially, the same facts as those alleged in the petition filed by the assignee in the district court. The relief asked is based upon the following grounds: 1. That these lands were the property of the bankrupt at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy. 2. That the deed of 1863 was never delivered by the grantor to the defendants, or to any of them, in the presence of the subscribing witnesses, nor "until he became so greatly involved that he feared his creditors could reach said lands." 3. That the deed was wholly voluntary. 4. That if the defendants ever had a right to recover the lands from the assignee, their cause of action is barred by section 5057 of the Revised Statutes, which provides: "No suit, either at law or in equity, shall be maintainable in any court between an assignee in bankruptcy and a person claiming an adverse interest, touching any property or rights of property transferable to or vested in such assignee, unless brought within two years from the time when the cause of action accrued for or against such assignee. And this provision shall not in any case waive a right of action barred at the time when an assignee is appointed." 5. That the deed held by the defendants creates a cloud upon the title of the assignee, and interferes with his sale of the lands for an adequate price.

The defendants in their answer resist the claim of the assignee upon the same grounds relied upon in the original proceeding in the district court. They also filed their cross bill, seeking a decree for the surrender of the lands to them, and an accounting by the assignee in respect to the rents by him received.

The circuit court, by its final decree, directed the surrender of the deed for cancellation, de- [386] clared it to be null and void, dismissed the cross-bill, and ordered the assignee, under the direction of the district court, sitting in bankruptcy, to sell the lands and distribute the proceeds.

The lands conveyed by Barnes to his children having come to the possession of, and being claimed by, his assignee, and the title thereto being in dispute, the petition filed by the latter in the district court was authorized by section 5068 of the Revised Statutes. Under the pleadings in that suit—all the parties therein having appeared, asserted their respective claims to the lands, and sought a determination of the dispute between them—it was competent for the district court, sitting in bankruptcy, to have determined, at least, the question of title. Had that court adjudged that the lands belonged to [389] the grantor in the deed of 1863 at the time he was adjudged a bankrupt, that judgment, until reversed or modified, would have been a bar to any new action by the defendants for the recovery of the property.

But we have seen that the assignee, after the expiration of several years, and without notice to the defendants, withdrew his cause from the district court, and instituted this suit in the circuit court, substantially for the same relief as that asked in his petition in the district court; using, upon the hearing of this suit, the evidence taken in his original suit. Evidently he supposed that, in a new suit in the circuit court, the limitation of two years prescribed by section 5057 of the Revised Statutes would defeat any claim to the lands which the defendants might assert. But that section, if applicable at all to such a case as this, is applicable to the plaintiff as well as to the defendants. If the assignee claims that the question of title could only be determined in a suit in equity in the circuit court, it might well be said that, not having himself instituted suit in the proper court against the holders of the legal title, within two years from the time of the cause of action accrued to him, he could not maintain the present suit. But we are of opinion that the suit in the district court and the present suit, having substantially the same object, are to be regarded, for the purposes of the limitation prescribed by section 5057, as the same suit, the latter being, in effect, a continuation of the former. It results that the question between the assignee and the grantees in the deed of 1863, as to the title to the lands in dispute, was raised in apt time. During the whole period, from the commencement of the suit in the district court until the institution of the present suit, the defendants have asserted their ownership of these lands, denying that they constituted a part of the bankrupt's estate. They met the issue tendered by the assignee in the forum selected by himself. To permit him to abandon that forum without their knowledge or consent, and—in computing the time fixed for bringing actions, by or against assignees, touching property claimed adversely to him—[390] to exclude the period between the institution of the suit in the district court and the commencement of this suit, would make the statute an instrument of fraud. It cannot receive that construction.

Upon the merits of the case we have no serious difficulty. The evidence satisfies us that the conveyance of 1863 was not made with any intent to hinder or defraud the creditors of the grantor. The latter was, at that time, in such condition, as to property, that he could, without injustice to creditors, make a gift of these lands to his children. The transaction was in good faith, and was not a mere device to hinder and defraud creditors. The deed was promptly delivered by the grantor to one for all of the grantees. The possession of the lands by the father, at times, subsequent to the execution and delivery of the deed, and his control of them apparently for his own benefit, is satisfactorily explained by witnesses. His possession, after the deed of 1863, was not intended to be, and was not in fact, adverse to his grantees. According to the weight of evidence he held possession under and for his children. The only fact in the case which creates doubt on this point is that he improperly included these lands in his schedule of the real estate of which he was in possession when he filed his petition in bankruptcy. But that circumstance, even if not satisfactorily explained, cannot legally affect the rights of his grantees, and is only important as bearing somewhat on his credibility as a witness, testifying that he delivered the deed immediately upon its execution, and that his possession at a later period was for his children. Ga. Code, 1867, in force Jan. 1, 1863, §§ 1942, 2620; Clayton v. Brown, 17 Ga. 217, 222; Clayton v. Brown, 30 Ga. 491, 495; Weed v. Davis, 25 Ga. 684; Wallace v. Penfield, 106 U. S. 262 [27: 148]; Jay v. Welchel, Sup. Ct. Ga. April 4, 1887.

There is still another view of the case. If the grantor was insolvent when he made the conveyance of 1863, or, if the lands so conveyed constituted more, in value, of his estate than he could rightfully withdraw from the reach of creditors and give to his children; in either case, the assignee in bankruptcy—there being no [391] fraud on the part of the grantor—has no standing to impeach the conveyance. The deed was good as between the grantor and his children; and, in the absence of fraud, could not be questioned by the assignee, who took only such rights as the bankrupt had. Yeatman v. Savings Inst. 95 U. S. 764, 766 [24: 589, 590]; Stewart v. Platt, 101 U. S. 731, 738 [25: 816, 817]; Hauseit v. Harrison, 105 U. S. 401, 406 [26: 1075, 1076]; R. S. § 5046. It could only be avoided by creditors who were such at the date of the conveyance. Warren v. Moody, 122 U. S. 132 [ante, 1108], present term.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that the assignee in bankrupty of Barnes has no valid claim to said lands or any of them; and that the deed of 1863 was not void as between him and the grantees therein. The Circuit court erred in declaring it to be void, and in ordering the sale of the lands, under the direction of the district court, as part of the bankrupt's estate.

The decree is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to set aside the entire decree of November 25, 1882, and for such further proceedings as are consistent with this opinion. Reversed.

SAME v. SILAS WEEKS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 376-382.)

Marine insurance—covenant not to insure interest in vessel—insurance on freight to be earned, not a breach.

An insurance on freight to be earned by the voyage, and not on the cargo simply, is not a breach of a covenant by the insured not to insure their respective interests in the vessel "or any other insurable interest in said interest, during the continuance of this policy", beyond the specified amounts.

[Nos. 77, 78.]

Submitted April 18, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana.

On petition for rehearing. Denied.

For a statement of the case see the report of the opinion of this court upon the former hearing, ante, p. 358.

Mr. Thomas J. Semmes, for petitioner.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

The ground of this application is that the [381] court committed an error on the former hearing in finding as a fact that the other insurance shown by the new testimony was on the cargo and not on the freight to be earned by the voyage. There were six policies proven—one in the Portland Lloyds for $2,000, another in the Crescent City Company of New Orleans for $3,000, another in the Merchants Marine of Bangor, Maine, for $4,000, another in the Union of Bangor for $2,000, and two others in Lloyds of London, England, each for £1,100. Those in the Crescent City and London Lloyds describe a risk on cargo, and nothing else. Baring Brothers & Company effected the insurance in London, as they say, by "two policies of insurance upon part of the freight of the ship Orient." Charles E. Rice, the secretary of the Crescent City Company, says he issued that policy "on the interest of John Baker, on the freight list of the ship Orient." Construing the language of the other three policies as meaning the same thing as those which were clearly on the cargo, we did not consider it necessary at the former hearing to do more than decide, as we did, that an insurance on cargo was not a breach of the warranty in the policies sued on. But if it be otherwise, and the policies in the other three companies were on the freight o be earned by the voyage and not on the cargo simply, we see no occasion for a reargument [382] of the case, as we are all of opinion that such an insurance would not be a breach of the covenant of the insured not to insure their respective interests in the vessel, "or any other insurable interest in said interest, during the continuance of this policy," beyond the specified amounts.

Rehearing denied.

Railroads—fixtures—when covered by prior mortgage as against furnisher—sale under execution—redemption by subsequent lienholder—exhaustion of first lien—Indiana Statute—error in opinion, not affecting result.

1. Rails and other property, which become affixed to and a part of a railroad covered by a prior mortgage will be held by the lien of such mortgage in favor of bona fide creditors, as against a contract between the furnisher of the property and the railroad company which provided that the title thereto should remain in the former until the contract price is paid. This rule applied to bridges and bridge materials.

2. The sale of property under execution exhausts the lien of the judgment as superior to the lien of a subsequent mortgage and a redemption by the subsequent lienholder does not restore the lien of the judgment creditor.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

On petition for rehearing. Denied.

For a full history and the facts of the case see main report, ante, p. 880.

The grounds of this petition are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William H. Calkins, John S. Cooper and A. C. Harris, for petitioners.

Mr. E. W. Tolerton, also for petitioner, The Smith Bridge Company.

[280] Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees in this case petition for a rehearing. The case was decided at the present term, and is reported in 120 U. S. 649 [ante, 830]. The application for a rehearing covers all the grounds discussed in the opinion of this court, and others which, though not touched upon in the opinion, were fully considered by the court in arriving at its judgment. Upon all the questions covered by the opinion we adhere to our conclusions, and we see nothing in the special grounds taken in regard to the cases of some of the appellees to warrant a different result from that arrived at on the former hearing. It is proper, however, to notice two of the grounds urged in respect to two of the appellees.

The appellee Irwin claims that, by virtue of the lien laws of the State of Indiana, he recovered a judgment for the amount of his claim against the railway company, which became a lien prior to the lien of the mortgages, and that, notwithstanding an attempted redemption by John C. New, the trustee in the mortgages, the lien of the judgment remained good (1) because the redemption laws of the State of Indiana did not apply to the case; and (2) because New did not comply with such laws in regard to redemption, in such manner as to destroy the lien of the judgment. It is contended on the part of Irwin that the Indiana Statute does not authorize a redemption from a sale of railroad property; that New had no lien on the property sold; and that a redemption redeems simply from the sale, and does not discharge the property from the lien, but only postpones any balance remaining due on the lien to the amount paid for redemption. [281]

The decree of the Circuit Court of Warren County, made in April, 1884, in the suit to foreclose the lien, brought by Irwin, forecloses the lien for $11,815.70, as a lien on the line of the railway for a certain distance in Warren County. In June, 1884, execution was issued for a sale, and on the 12th of July, 1884, the property was sold by the sheriff to Irwin for $500, and a certificate of purchase was issued to Irwin, stating that he would be entitled to a deed of the property in fee simple in one year from the 12th of July, 1884, if the same should not be redeemed by the defendant or any other person entitled thereto, paying the purchase money, with interest at 8 per cent per annum, before the expiration of the one year. On the 10th of July, 1885, and within the year, New, as trustee in the mortgages, paid to the clerk of the circuit court $539.78, in redemption of the property so sold, that being the amount necessary at that date to redeem the property.

It is very clear that, by the sale of the property on the execution, the lien of Irwin upon the property was exhausted, as a lien superior to the mortgages, upon that part of the railway which was covered by such superior lien. The property redeemed by New was the property sold under the decree in favor of Irwin. The redemption by New did not have the effect to restore the lien of the decree upon the property sold and redeemed. The redemption was not made by the judgment debtor, so as to vacate the sale and reinstate the lien for the balance of the judgment which the purchase money of the sale did not pay. The redemption was made by another and a subsequent lienholder, [282] who redeemed for his own benefit and the benefit of those for whom he was trustee, and not for the benefit of Irwin.

This we understand to be the meaning and effect of the Statute of Indiana in regard to redemption. Rev. Stat. Ind. 1881, secs. 770–776. We are not referred to any decisions of the courts of Indiana, giving any other construction to these provisions. Section 774 gives the right to redeem to a person having a lien otherwise than by judgment. The statute gives no right to Irwin to redeem from New. The sale of the property on the foreclosure of the mortgages given to New, subsequently to the redemption by New, conveyed the redeemed property to its purchaser on the sale, free and discharged from the lien under the decree in favor of Irwin, on which the sale redeemed from was made; and none of the proceeds of the sale on the foreclosure of the mortgages given to New can be applied to pay the unpaid portion of Irwin's decree. If the grading, embankment and excavation done by Irwin was subject to a sale on execution under his judgment, the redemption law applies to the case, and was complied with by New.

It is claimed, on behalf of the Smith Bridge Company, that the contracts between it and the railway company, for the construction of the bridges, provided that the bridges should remain the property of the Smith Bridge Company until the contract price for them should have been fully paid, and that, in default of such payment, the Smith Bridge Company should have the right to remove the bridges and bridge material; that the mortgages became a lien on the bridges only as the bridges became the rightful and legal property of the railway company; that Porter, before he purchased the bonds, had notice of the equities of the Smith Bridge Company growing out of their contracts; and that the First National Bank of Chicago had like notice before it acquired any interest in the bonds. The contracts of the Smith Bridge Company were made in October, 1882, and in July, 1883. The bonds were pledged to Dull and McCormick in January, 1882, and passed from them to Drexel, Morgan & Co., in January, 1883. The bridges became [283] a part of the permanent structure of the railroad, as much so as the rails laid upon the bridges or upon the railroad outside of the bridges. Whatever is the rule applicable to locomotives and cars, and loose property susceptible of separate ownership and of separate liens, and to real estate not used for railroad purposes, as to their being unaffected by a prior mortgage given by a railroad company, covering after acquired property, it is well settled, in the decisions of this court, that rails and other articles which become affixed to and a part of a railroad covered by a prior mortgage will be held by the lien of such mortgage in favor of bona fide creditors, as against any contract between the furnisher of the property and the railroad company, containing stipulations like those in the contracts in the present case. Dunham v. R. Co. 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 254 [17:584]; Galveston R. R. v. Cowdrey, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 459, 480, 482 [20:199, 206]; U. S. v. New Orleans R. R. 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 362, 365 [20:434, 436]; Dillon v. Barnard, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 430, 440 [22:678, 678]; Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235, 251 [25: 339, 342].

In regard to the alleged notice to Porter and to the First National Bank of Chicago, no such notice was given until after Dull and McCormick, and Drexel, Morgan & Co. had acquired their rights, as bona fide holders of the bonds: and Porter, by purchasing the bonds from Drexel, Morgan & Co., acquired all their rights and those of Dull and McCormick, as shown in the former opinion, and those rights were free in their hands from any notice of any claim of the Smith Bridge Company. Commissioners v. Belles, 94 U. S. 104, 109 [24:46, 48]; Montclair v. Ramsdell, 107 U. S. 147 [27:431].

An error was committed in the former opinion, p. 657 [834], in stating that each of the five appellees knew of the pledge of the bonds to Drexel, Morgan & Co. for the loan, and knew that they were getting a part of the money loaned by Drexel, Morgan & Co. This was not true in regard to all of the five appellees, but was true in regard to only some of them. The error does not affect the result on the merits.

The application for a rehearing is denied.

MAXWELL LAND-GRANT COMPANY ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 365–376.)

Mexican grant to Beaubien and Miranda—petition for rehearing—newly discovered evidence.

1. A rehearing cannot be had in this court because of newly discovered evidence. It can only be had upon the record before the court as it came from the court below.

2. In the case presented, this court did not rest its judgment at the former hearing upon the ground that the grant in question was an empresario grant, but upon the ground that Congress, having confirmed it as made to Beaubien and Miranda and reported for confirmation by the Surveyor-General of New Mexico to that body, without qualification or limitation as to its extent, acted in that respect within its power, and that its action was conclusive upon the court.

3. Upon petition for a rehearing this court still holds: that the grant, as confirmed by the action of Congress, is a valid grant; that the survey and the patent issued upon it, as well as the original grant by Armijo, are entirely free from any fraud on the part of the grantees or those claiming under them; and that Beaubien in his petition to the Departmental Assembly referred to a different grant as not exceeding fifteen or eighteen leagues.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado.

On petition of the United States for rehearing. Opinion below, 26 Fed. Rep. 118. Denied.

The grounds of this petition are set forth in the opinion.

For full history and statement of the case see main report, ante, p. 949.

Mr. William A. Maury, Assist. Atty-Gen., for petitioner.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of [37(
the court:

A petition for a rehearing has been filed in this case, and on account of its importance, as well as the interest in it manifested by the Department of the Interior, we have considered the petition very fully, and, departing from our usual custom, make some response to its suggestions.

The first ground on which a rehearing is asked is that this court was in error in treating the grant to Beaubien and Miranda as an empresario grant, upon which alleged mistake it is asserted that the decision of the court turned. The error, however, is in the assumption in the petition that the decision of the court turned upon that point. It is true that the Assistant Attorney-General, in his argument on behalf of the United States, rested the case almost exclusively, so far as he was concerned, on the proposition that the validity of the grant was governed by the limitation of the decree of the Mexican Congress of 1824 to eleven square leagues for each grantee, in ordinary grants; and in response to that argument we endeavored to show, that while the land in controversy was not strictly an empresario grant, there being no evidence of a contract with any person to bring emigrants from abroad for the purpose of settling them upon the land, yet that it partook very largely of that character, and that Beaubien and Miranda, Governor Armijo, the Departmental Assembly, and the Surveyor-General, had all looked upon it as partaking so much of that nature, in regard to the quantity of land granted, as well as the actual settlement of families upon it, that the Congress of the United States was justified in treating it likewise. But we stated distinctly that we did not rest our judgment upon the fact of its being an empresario grant, but upon the proposition that the Congress of the United States, having confirmed this grant as made to Beaubien and Miranda, and reported for confirmation by the Surveyor-General of New Mexico to that body, without qualification or limitation as to its extent, acted in that respect within its power, and that its action was conclusive upon the court.

[371] In the opinion, after discussing the history of this grant, and its conformity to the character of a colonization grant, it was said, 121 U. S. 863 [ante, 952]: "The final confirmation of this grant by the Congress of the United States in 1860 affords strong ground to believe that that body viewed it as one of this character, and not one governed by the limitation of eleven square leagues to each grantee."

Afterwards we added, p. 365 [952]: "But whether, as a matter of fact, this was a grant, not limited in quantity, by the Mexican decree of 1824, or whether it was a grant which in strict law would have been held by the Mexican Government, if it had continued in the ownership of the property, to have been subject to that limitation, it is not necessary to decide at this time. By the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, under which the United States acquired the right of property in all the public lands of that portion of New Mexico which was ceded to this country, it became its right, it had the authority, and it engaged itself by that treaty to confirm valid Mexican grants. If, therefore, the great surplus which it is claimed was conveyed by its patent to Beaubien and Miranda was the property of the United States, and Congress, acting in its sovereign capacity upon the question of the validity of the grant, chose to treat it as valid for the boundaries given to it by the Mexican Governor, it is not for the judicial department of this Government to controvert their power to do so."

In support of this we cited Tameling v. United States F. & E. Co. 93 U. S. 644 [23: 998], in which that proposition is emphatically laid down. And in the concluding paragraph of the opinion, referring to the constitutional provision that Congress shall have power to dispose of the territory, or other property, belonging to the United States, p. 382 [ante, 959], we further said:

"At the time that Congress passed upon the grant to Beaubien and Miranda, whatever interest there was in the land claimed which was not legally or equitably their property was the property of the United States; and Congress having the power to dispose of that property, and having, as we understand it, confirmed this grant, and thereby made such disposition of it, it is not easily to be perceived how the courts of the United States can set aside this action of Congress."

It is, therefore, quite clear that, as regards this question, the court rested its opinion upon the action of the Congress of the United States.

In reference to this action of Congress, the petition says that it was error on the part of the court "further to assume that the Surveyor-General reported to Congress upon the extent of the grant, or that Congress knew or considered the question of quantity, since no survey had been made and no statement of area, other than that made by Beaubien to the Departmental Assembly, appears in the papers in the case."

It is nowhere stated in the opinion of the court that Congress had before it any actual computation of the contents of this grant, either of the number of acres or the number of square leagues, but what the court said upon that subject was in reply to the argument of the counsel for the United States, that the Surveyor-General had no authority to determine upon the extent of the grant. This was shown to be an error, inasmuch as the statute under which he acted required him to report upon the extent of the grant, as well as upon its validity.

It is true that there was in the papers no report of the number of leagues or the number of acres embraced within the grant. That was probably not known with any degree of accuracy by anybody at that time. But the grant by Armijo to Beaubien and Miranda described the boundaries in a manner which could leave no doubt upon the mind of Congress that the grant was an immense one, and so largely exceeded twenty-two leagues that there could be no question upon that subject. Besides this, there was among the papers in the office of the Surveyor-General the diseño, or plat, made and returned by the alcalde, Vigil, who delivered the juridical possession to the grantees, which also made it plain that an immense quantity of land beyond the twenty-two leagues was included within the grant.

Other reasons given in the opinion, which we do not think it necessary to repeat here, convince us that Congress knew that it was dealing with an extraordinary grant, and must have decided that it should not be limited by [3 the eleven leagues of the Mexican law.

It is said further in the petition that "The court was also mistaken in conceiving that Beaubien's statement to the Departmental Assembly, that the grant claimed did not exceed fifteen or eighteen leagues, referred to a grant made to Martinez."

In the argument of the case before us counsel made but a brief allusion to the proposition that Beaubien, in the petition which he presented against the intrusion of the priest Martinez, speaks of his own grant as being only about fifteen leagues, to which we responded, p. 373 [955]: "We think a critical examination of that petition will show that he is speaking of the claim of Martinez and his associates as amounting in all to about fifteen leagues, and not of his own claim under the grant." As this is again presented to us as a reason for a rehearing in this case, we will give a little more attention to it than its importance deserves.

After the grant was made to Beaubien and Miranda, on January 11, 1841, Cornelio Vigil, on the 22d day of February, 1843, as justice of the peace, delivered the juridical possession, of which we have already spoken, to the grantees. The petition of Charles Beaubien to the then Governor of New Mexico, who appears to have been some person other than Armijo, the original grantor, is dated April 13, 1844. It was designed to obtain a revocation of an order made by the then Governor, February 27, 1844, permitting Martinez to use and occupy a part of the land included within the grant by Armijo to Beaubien and Miranda. The whole matter is very imperfectly stated, but it would seem that Martinez, in his petition asking for this order, asserted that the grant to Mr. Charles Bent, which was prior in time to that to Beaubien and Miranda, included the land which he and his associates desired to use, and which he had purchased of Bent. It will be readily seen by anyone, even through the bad translation of the language of Beaubien, that he is endeavoring to show that the grant to Bent could not include any of the land within his own grant. He says on that subject: "I have been prevented from carrying those projects into effect" (meaning the making of settlements upon his grant), "on account of the decree of the 27th of February last, issued by Your Excellency, and which, through your secretary, was communicated to the prefecture of the first district, in order that paying attention to the petition addressed to Your Excellency by the curate Martinez and others in reference to the grant of lands made to the citizen of the United States, Mr. Charles Bent, and that all use made of them be suspended, I have to state to Your Excellency, in defense of those lands which are in our possession, according to the titles thereto, which are in our possession, that the petition addressed to Your Excellency by the curate Martinez and others is founded upon an erroneous principle, as the aforesaid Mr. Bent has not acquired any right to the said lands. It is therefore very strange that the curate Martinez and others pretend to involve our property, as it has no connection with that of that individual; therefore, it is to be presumed, the necessary consequence must be, that the curate Martinez and his associates do not know to whom those lands belong, nor their extent, as he states that a large number of leagues were granted, when the grant does not exceed fifteen or eighteen, which will be seen by the accompanying judicial certificates."

He then goes on to show other errors and mistakes in the claim of Martinez and his associates, on account of which he appeals to the Governor, who referred the matter to the Departmental Assembly, and that body recommended the revocation of the order in favor of Martinez, to which the Governor conformed.

We think it impossible for anybody, after reading this statement, with any just conception of the facts to which it related, to believe that Beaubien, in referring to the fifteen or eighteen leagues, meant his own grant and not the grant to Charles Bent, under which the curate Martinez was claiming. It would be an absurdity to suppose that Beaubien, claiming a grant whose boundaries, described by rivers, mountains and uplands, must have contained more than a million of acres, to whom juridical possession had been delivered and the report of it made about a year before these proceedings, could have intended to make to any public authority, a statement which must be referred to the Departmental Assembly composed of the representatives of the Territory, that his grant only included fifteen or eighteen leagues. This fact, concurring with the grammatical construction of the language used, the meaning of which can be plainly perceived through what is, perhaps, a very imperfect translation, leaves no doubt now in our minds, after a thorough examination, that the statement of the opinion was correct. [375]

There is a reference in the part of the petition for a rehearing which was prepared in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, to the existence of new and material evidence touching the fraudulent character of the grant, which we must suppose to have been addressed to the Secretary of the Interior and the Attorney-General as reasons for obtaining a new trial if they could, and not addressed to this court as any legal foundation for reconsidering its decision. If this court should grant a rehearing it could only be had, according to the uniform course of the court during its whole existence, upon the record now before the court as it came from the Circuit Court for the District of Colorado.

We have thus considered all the points suggested in the petition as grounds for rehearing with the utmost care. The case itself has been pending in the courts of the United States since August, 1882, and, on account of its importance, was advanced out of its order for hearing in this court. The arguments on both sides of the case were unrestricted in point of time, and were wanting in no element of ability, industrious research, or clear apprehension of the principles involved in it. The court was thoroughly impressed with the importance of the case, not only as regarded the extent of the grant and its value, but also on account of its involving principles which will become precedents in cases of a similar nature, now rapidly increasing in number. It was therefore given a most careful examination, and this petition for a rehearing has had a similar attentive consideration. The result is that we are entirely satisfied that the grant, as confirmed by the action of Congress, is a valid grant; that the survey and the patent issued upon it, as well as the original grant by Armijo, are entirely free from any fraud on the part of the grantees or those claiming under them; and that the decision could be no other than that which the learned judge of the circuit court below made, and which this court affirmed. [376]

The petition for rehearing is therefore denied.

SAMUEL CLINTON, Plff. in Err.,

v.

MISSOURI PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 469–477.)

Practice—proceeding to condemn land for railroad purposes—removal after appeal from county to district court—dismissal of appeal by U. S. Circuit Court—Nebraska Statute—transcript from state court, part of record—bill of exceptions—assignment of error.

1. In a proceeding to condemn land for railroad purposes, the case having been removed after appeal from the County Court to the District Court of the State wherein the land is situated, it is held:

a. That the court below improperly dismissed the case on the ground that the appeal to the district court was not taken within the statutory time of sixty days after the assessment;

b. That said period of sixty days did not commence to run until the final action of the commissioners in presenting their report to the county court; and not when they viewed the ground;

c. That the filing of a transcript, though imperfect, which could be amended by the writ of certiorari was sufficient to make the appeal valid;

d. That the assignment of error in this court is sufficient; and

e. That this court can review the order of dismissal upon the record presented, which contains the transcript of the record from the state court.

2. A judgment appealed from requires no bill of exceptions, but is simply to be transcribed as a part of the record.

3. Upon removal, the transcript from the state court becomes a part of the record, and as such is reviewable by this court.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska. Reversed, Remanded.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. John M. Thurston, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. John F. Dillon, for defendant in error.

[470] Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is in many respects anomalous and bristles with points, but it is otherwise not very important. It commenced in a proceeding instituted by the Missouri Pacific Railway Company of Nebraska, under a statute of that State providing for the condemnation of land for the use of railroads. It was begun in the County Court of Cass County, Nebraska, by which a commission was appointed to make the assessment of damages. From this assessment, after it was returned to the county court, Samuel Clinton, some of whose land was taken, appealed to the district court of said county. In that court he made a motion, which was successful, to remove the case into the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska. In this latter court a motion was made to remand the case to the District Court of Cass County, which seems never to have been acted upon, but on a motion made by the Railway Company to dismiss the appeal—meaning thereby the appeal from the County Court to the District Court of Cass County—the circuit court granted the motion and dismissed the appeal. The matter, therefore, not being remanded to the state court, the Circuit Court of the United States deciding that no valid appeal had been taken from the County to the District Court of Cass County, the dismissal of the appeal was of course an end of the case.

To this judgment of dismissal the present writ of error is prosecuted.

The only error assigned by the plaintiff here is in the following language:

"The court below sustained the motion to dismiss, solely upon the ground that the appeal had not been taken within the statutory time of sixty days after the assessment, deciding that the time commenced to run from the day when the commissioners met and viewed the land, [471] and not from the date of the return of their assessment. This is the only error relied upon by plaintiff in error."

The defendant in error insists that the case should be dismissed here for want of an assignment of errors. In regard to this it is sufficient to say that it would be difficult to formulate a more precise and specific assignment of error than that contained in the foregoing extract from the brief of the plaintiff.

The next point presented is that the ruling of the court in this case, upon the question of the dismissal of the appeal is not presented by any bill of exceptions, and that there is nothing in the record on which this court can review that decision. But the determination of this subject is the final judgment of the court. This is so in any sense in which it can be looked at. The order to dismiss is in the following terms:

"This cause coming on to be heard this 20th day of December, 1883, on the motion filed by the defendant to dismiss the appeal herein from the assessment of damages made by the commissioners appointed by the County Court of Cass County, Nebraska, on the ground that said appeal was not taken within sixty days after the assessment of damages to said real estate by said commissioners, and for other reasons contained in said motion on file, and on [474] argument of counsel and on consideration thereof by the court, the court doth here find that said appeal was not taken within sixty days from the date of the assessment of damage made by such commissioners of the land in controversy, and the court doth sustain said motion to dismiss such appeal. It is ordered by the court here that said appeal be, and the same is hereby dismissed, each party to pay its own costs."

If it be true that the appeal from the Cass County Court to the district court of that county was not taken in time, that is, within the sixty days referred to in this judgment, there is an end of the plaintiff's case in any court whatever. The Circuit Court for the District of Nebraska, assuming to come into the place of the District Court of Cass County, and exercising the powers which that court would have exercised if the case had not been removed, holds that no valid appeal was taken, and for that reason dismissed the case. If such finding be correct and it remains as a valid judgment, it puts an end to the plaintiff's claim; it can nowhere be considered any further, and it is final upon the questions involved in the case.

As to the proposition that it cannot be reviewed here for want of a bill of exceptions, that is equally untenable. A judgment of a court appealed from is never incorporated into a bill of exceptions. It is always a part of the record of the case, and, like the plea and the verdict, it needs no bill of exceptions, but is simply to be transcribed as a part of the record. In this case it presents for itself the point or matter on which the court acted. It is there distinctly stated that the case was dismissed because the appeal was not taken within sixty days from the date of the assessment of damages made by the commissioners. Now, if the facts on which this decision was made are to be found in what may be properly called the record of the case before the judge when he decided it, as it is here presented to us, then there was no need of any bill of exceptions in the matter.

Whatever there was on that subject to guide the action of the court on the motion to dismiss [475] the appeal was found in the transcript as it came from the state court and was filed in the Circuit Court of the United States. If there was enough in that transcript to present the question in this case, then we must review it; for we take it to be a necessary rule in such cases that the transcript from the state court becomes a part of the record of the case in the federal court. There is no mode by which that transcript, or any of its contents, can be abstracted and made a part of a bill of exceptions to be signed by the federal judge. He can know nothing about what takes place in the state court, personally, and cannot therefore certify to it. It comes to him as certified by the court in which the proceedings were had. It is itself the foundation on which he is to act in the future proceedings in the case. It is already a record of another court transcribed and certified to his court; and in any writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States that transcript from the state court necessarily becomes a part of the record.

As regards the main point, that the appeal was not taken within sixty days, this transcript, which is said to be imperfect, sufficiently shows that the commissioners were appointed; that they returned the award and assessment of damages into the county court on the first day of December, 1881, allowing to Clinton for damages to his property, known as the "Mill Reserve," the sum of $850, and that on January 28, 1882, Clinton filed a notice of appeal from this award. Although the time is pretty close, it is very obvious—these things being matters of record—that Clinton intended to appeal within the sixty days allowed by the statute, and that he did appeal within sixty days after the commissioners filed the award, and thereby made it public.

We think the circuit judge, in dismissing this appeal because it was not taken in time, erred in holding that the assessment of damages must be considered as having been made on the 28d of November, at which time they went upon the ground to view it. There is no reason to believe that on that day they made their assessment. There was no assessment of damages, however much it may have been talked about, until they concluded upon and signed a final report upon that subject, and it is not to be be- [476] lieved that the Nebraska Statute, limiting the right of appeal from the award of such commissioners to sixty days, intended that period should commence to run at any time prior to the final action of the board in presenting their report to the county court. This point seems to have been so decided by the Supreme Court of Nebraska in the case of Gifford v. Republican Valley and K. R. R. Co. 20 Neb. 588. On this point, therefore, the judgment of the circuit court, which is here for review, was evidently erroneous.

Another point taken by counsel for defendant in error is that the requirements specified by the Supreme Court of Nebraska have not been complied with, that court having, in the case just referred to, decided that "The essentially requisite proceeding to perfect an appeal from the award of commissioners, in a case of this kind, and to give the district court jurisdiction of the same, is to file in the said court, or in the office of the clerk thereof, a certified transcript from the county judge of the condemnation proceedings, from the original application to said county judge for the appointment of commissioners to the report of such commissioners in the respective case, both inclusive."

It is urged that the transcript filed in the district court in this case was imperfect and defective, among other reasons, because it did not contain a copy of any petition of the Railway Company for the appointment of commissioners. We are of opinion, however, that what was filed in the district court was sufficient to give that court jurisdiction to proceed further in the case. It contained the order appointing the commissioners, the swearing of them to perform their duties, the report which they made in the matter, the award of $850 damages upon Clinton's property and the taking of the appeal by him, and the service of notice of that appeal on the parties. This is sufficient, at least, to show to the district court that a case had arisen which the statute intended might be brought before that court on appeal. If it had been suggested by either party that this transcript was imperfect or defective because it omitted some paper, or order, or matter in the county court, which was necessary to the hearing in the district court, the usual and [477] proper way of correcting that evil, pursued in all courts of appeal, would be by certiorari directed to the court from which the appeal was taken, commanding it to send up the complete and perfect record.

The case of Gifford v. R. R. Co., above referred to, gives support to this view of the subject. There, no transcript of the record in the county court, whether perfect or imperfect, was filed in the district court, and it was on this ground of the entire failure to have any transcript whatever of the proceedings in the county court filed within sixty days, as well as the absence of all sufficient effort to do so, that the dismissal in that case was sustained. In that opinion Republican Valley R. R. Co. v. McPherson, 12 Neb. 480, is cited with approval, in which case, although no transcript whatever was filed within the sixty days limited by the statute, yet the evidence given by the appellant, of diligent effort to obtain a transcript from the county judge and his refusal to make one in due time, was accepted as a sufficient reason why the appeal should not be dismissed.

We are of opinion that where there is a transcript furnished by the county judge, even though it be imperfect, the same having been filed in due time, and which could be amended as to its imperfections by the writ of certiorari, that it must be held sufficient to make the appeal valid.

For the error of the Circuit Court in dismissing the appeal the judgment is reversed, and the case remanded to that court for further proceedings according to law.

Pleading—evidence—variance—consideration—instructions—usury—exceptions.

In an action on a contract whereby the defendants agreed to repurchase certain shares of stock sold by them to the plaintiff, it is held:

a. That the contract and an extension thereof are admissible in evidence under the declaration, although they express a consideration of one dollar;

b. That said consideration need not be stated or proven; that the second count sets out the contract according to its legal effect;

c. That a letter from the plaintiff notifying the defendants of his readiness to sell and transfer the stock, is admissible in evidence;

d. That an instruction that the plaintiff might recover under the common money counts, if erroneous, did not prejudice the defendants;

e. That an instruction that there can be no usury where there is no loan, and that the defendants had shown no loan, was correct; and,

f. That a statement, not verified or included in any proper bill of exceptions, that counsel objected to certain parts of the charge, cannot be treated as a part of the record for any purpose.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. George Shiras, Jr., Rasselas Brown and W. M. Lindsay, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. John Dalzell, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

[488] This is an action of assumpsit brought by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error and Thomas S. Blair, the latter not having been served with process. The declaration contained two special counts, as follows:

"For that whereas heretofore, to wit, on the 4th day of April, A. D. 1873, at New York, to wit, in the Western District of Pennsylvania aforesaid, in consideration that the said plaintiff, at the special instance and request of the said defendant, would take and pay for, at the rate of $50 per share, four hundred (400) shares of the capital stock of the Blair Iron and Steel Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Pennsylvania, they, the said defendants, undertook, and then and there faithfully promised the said plaintiff, that if at the end of one year from said date he, the said plaintiff, should desire to sell the said shares at the said price by him paid for the same, they, the said defendants, would purchase the said shares of the said stock, to wit, four hundred shares of the said Blair Iron and Steel Company, at the said price, to wit, fifty dollars per share, and pay him, the said plaintiff, therefor at the said rate, together with interest at the rate of 7 per centum per annum.

"And the said plaintiff avers that he, confiding in the said promises and undertaking of the said defendants, did afterwards, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, to wit, at the district aforesaid, take and pay for four hundred (400) shares of said stock aforesaid, at the rate of $50 per share, amounting in all to a large sum, to wit, the sum of twenty thousand dollars ($20,000).

"And the said plaintiff further avers that at divers times subsequently, to wit, on the 4th day of April, A. D. 1874, and, to wit, on the 4th day of April, A. D. 1875, in consideration that the said plaintiff, at the special instance and request of the said defendants, would waive his right of election to sell to the said defendants the said shares of the capital stock of the said Blair Iron and Steel Company, to wit, four hundred (400) shares thereof, they, the said defendants, undertook, and then and there promised faithfully the said plaintiff, that [489] if at the end of one year from the said last mentioned dates, respectively, to wit, April 4, A. D. 1874, in the first instance, and April 4, A. D. 1875, lastly, he, the said plaintiff, should desire to sell the said hereinbefore mentioned shares at the said price by him paid for the same, they, the said defendants, would purchase the said shares of the said stock at the said price paid by him, the said plaintiff, paid therefor, to wit, fifty dollars per share, and pay him, the said plaintiff, therefor at the said rate, together with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum.

"Yet the said defendants, not regarding their said promises and undertakings, although often requested so to do, and although the said stock was by the said plaintiff tendered to the said defendants, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, to wit, at the district aforesaid, have not as yet paid to the said plaintiff the said sum of twenty thousand dollars ($20,000), but have hitherto wholly neglected and refused, and do still refuse and neglect, to wit, at the Western District of Pennsylvania, to the damage of the plaintiff thirty thousand dollars.

"And the said plaintiff further complains of the said defendants, for that whereas heretofore, to wit, on the 4th day of April, A. D. 1876, to wit, at the Western District of Pennsylvania, the said defendants bargained for and bought of the said plaintiff, at the special instance and request of the said defendants, and the said plaintiff then and there sold to the said defendants, a large quantity of goods, to wit, four hundred (400) shares of the capital stock of the Blair Iron and Steel Company, at the rate or price of $50 per share, with 7 per cent interest added from April 4, A. D. 1873, to be delivered by the said plaintiff to the said defendants, and to be paid for by the said defendants to the said plaintiff on the delivery thereof as aforesaid, and in consideration thereof, and that the plaintiff, at the like special instance and request of the said defendants, had then and there undertaken and faithfully promised the said defendants to deliver the said stock to the said defendants in the time and at the place aforesaid, they, the said defendants, undertook, [490] and then and there faithfully promised the said plaintiff, to accept the said stock of and from him, the said plaintiff, and to pay for the same on the delivery to them, the said defendants, as aforesaid.

"And though the said plaintiff afterwards, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, to wit, at the Western District of Pennsylvania aforesaid, was ready and willing and then and there tendered and offered to deliver the said stock to the said defendants, and then and there requested the said defendants to accept the same and to pay him therefor as aforesaid, yet the said defendants, not regarding their said promises and undertakings, but contriving and craftily and subtly intending to deceive and to defraud the said plaintiff in this behalf, did not nor would at the time when they were so requested as aforesaid, or at any time before or afterwards, accept the said stock or any part thereof of or from the said plaintiff, or pay him for the same as aforesaid, but then and there wholly neglected and refused so to do, to the damage of the plaintiff thirty thousand dollars."

It also contained common counts for goods bargained and sold, money had and received, and money laid out and expended for the use of the defendants.

To this declaration the plaintiff in error pleaded, as to all the counts: 1. That the consideration mentioned in the alleged agreements, referred to in the declaration, bearing date April 4, 1873, April 4, 1874, and March 22, 1875, was never paid, nor was any valid consideration paid or given, or agreed to be paid or given therefor. 2. That the alleged agreements were usurious under the laws of New York, where they were made, being a mere device or contrivance for obtaining to the plaintiff more than the legal rate of interest for money advanced by way of loan to the Blair Iron and Steel Company. 3. That the plaintiff did not tender the 400 shares of stock referred to in the plaintiff's declaration, as therein alleged. 4. That the alleged agreements were void as against public policy, being in fraud of the other subscribers to the stock of the Blair Iron and Steel Company, as they secured to the plaintiff an advantage over other subscribers by a secret agreement 5. That the agreement [491] set out in the declaration was without consideration. 6. The Statute of Limitations of six years.

The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $34,651.36, to reverse which this writ of error is prosecuted.

The transcript of the record contains what purports to be the charge of the court in full, with a memorandum at the close, stating that defendant's counsel excepted to certain portions thereof; but, as it is not verified, or included in any proper bill of exceptions, we are not at liberty to treat it as a part of the record for any purpose. Several bills of exception were taken, during the progress of the trial, to rulings of the court, on which assignments of error are alleged, and which we will consider in their order:

1. From the first bill of exceptions it appears that upon the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence two papers, one dated April 4, 1873, and the other March 22, 1875, as follows:

"New York, April 4, 1873.

"Whereas, Joseph W. Drexel has purchased four hundred shares of the stock of the Blair Iron and Steel Company, sold by A. S. Diven, trustee of said company, at the price of fifty dollars per share:

"Now, we, the undersigned, in consideration to us of one dollar, in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do hereby agree that if, at the end of one year from this date, the said Drexel shall desire to sell the said shares at the price paid for the same by him, we will purchase the same at that price, and pay to him the amount paid by him on the same, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum.

"April 4, 1873.

"THOS. S. BLAIR.
"THOMAS STRUTHERS."

"New York, March 22, 1875.

"In consideration of the waiver by Joseph W. Drexel of the right of election to sell to us the four hundred shares of stock in the Blair [492] Iron and Steel Company (subscribed and paid for by him), as he was entitled to do by agreement with us in 1873, renewed and extended by agreement of 1874 to April 4, 1875, we do hereby agree that his right to do so shall be extended for another year; viz., to April 4, 1876. If he shall at that time elect to sell to us the four hundred shares so subscribed and held by him, we will receive and pay for the same the amount paid by him therefor, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from the dates of the payment by him of the respective installments thereon, and as collateral security for the performance by us of this our agreement we have placed in the hands of Joseph W. Drexel four hundred shares of the stock of the said Blair Iron and Steel Company to be held by him in trust for that purpose.

"THOS. S. BLAIR.
"THOMAS STRUTHERS."

To the reception in evidence of these papers the defendants' counsel objected, stating that he did not deny their execution, but that they were not admissible in evidence, because the plaintiff had averred in the declaration that the consideration of the contract was the subscription to 400 shares of stock in the Blair Iron and Steel Company; whereas, in these papers the consideration set forth is the payment of one dollar. The objection was overruled, and an exception taken. This ruling is now alleged as error. In ruling on the papers, the court said the contracts were admitted subject to consideration thereafter, in view of further evidence which might be adduced. The bill of exceptions does not set out what, if any, further evidence was adduced. We are of opinion that the testimony was properly admitted. Even if there was a variance between the contract as shown by these papers and that alleged in the first count of the declaration, certainly there was none between the allegations of the second count and the written instrument as offered, according to its legal effect.

The second count of the declaration sets forth a contract whereby the plaintiff sold and agreed to deliver to the defendants 400 shares of the capital stock of the Blair Iron and Steel Company, at the price specified, to be paid by the [493] defendants on delivery, in consideration whereof the defendants undertook and promised to accept the said stock and pay for the same on delivery in accordance therewith. This is precisely the legal effect of the contract set out in the instrument dated April 4, 1878. The recital in that instrument, that the plaintiff had purchased the same from the trustee of the Blair Iron and Steel Company, is mere matter of inducement and immaterial. The statement of the consideration of one dollar paid is also entirely immaterial, and may be treated as merely nominal. The real agreement embodied in the instrument is, according to its legal effect, that at the end of one year from that date the defendants would buy and pay for the number of shares of stock mentioned at the price specified, on delivery thereof at that time by the plaintiff. When thereafter, at the time specified, as it was subsequently extended, the plaintiff exercised his option by a tender of the stock, the contract became unconditional and absolute, and from that time the plaintiff was entitled to treat it as a contract in ordinary form for the sale and delivery of the subject of the agreement. The second count of the declaration sets it out in that form, and according to its legal effect, which is all that is required by the strictest rules of pleading.

2. The second bill of exceptions shows that the plaintiff offered in evidence the following paper:

"New York, March 20, 1876.

"Gentlemen: I hereby notify you that I desire to sell the four hundred shares of the stock of the Blair Iron and Steel Company, held by me under the option of sale, according to the terms of the agreement between you and J. P. Morgan and J. W. Drexel, of April 4, 1878, and the several renewals thereof.

"You are hereby notified that I am ready to transfer the stock to you or to any person or persons whom you may designate, upon the payment of the purchase money thereof and 7 per cent interest thereon from date of payment.

"I hereby tender you the certificate of stock, [494] and I demand fulfillment of your contract on the premises. I am ready and willing at any time to transfer the stock upon the book of the company and fully perform the condition of rescission of purchase.

"Respectfully, J. W. DREXEL.

"To Mess. Thos. S. Blair and T. Struthers."

The admission of this paper in evidence, which was objected to, is assigned for error. There is no ground for this exception. The paper was certainly competent as constituting one item in the proof that the plaintiff exercised the option to sell the stock in accordance with the agreement, and tendered it for delivery.

3. The third bill of exceptions states that in the further progress of the trial the defendants' counsel offered to prove by two witnesses that the consideration of $1, named in the said agreement, was not paid by the plaintiff, or by anybody on his behalf, to the defendants. This offer was rejected on objection made, and an exception taken. We have already said that the mention of this nominal consideration was entirely immaterial, and might properly be omitted from any statement of the contract in a pleading which set out its legal effect. It was of course, therefore, not necessary to prove it, and immaterial if disproven. The real consideration for the defendants' agreement to buy was the plaintiff's agreement to sell, determined by the exercise of his option and the tender for delivery of the stock for that purpose.

4. The fourth bill of exceptions is based on an alleged error occurring in the following portion of the charge to the jury:

"Supposing that he (Wallace) did comply with his instructions (in making the demand), then did it become the duty of Mr. Struthers to pay the amount represented by that stock? If it did become his duty to pay that money, then we instruct you that the declaration in this case (what we call the common money counts) is sufficient to enable him to recover. Where parties have made a contract by which certain things are to be done on one side and certain things on the other, if one party does all those [495] things that are required to be done by him to entitle him to a sum of money from the other party, he may recover that sum of money under the common money counts. We instruct you, therefore, that so far as the pleadings are concerned, there is no difficulty in the plaintiff recovering, under the declaration, a verdict for the amount that is due him."

"The point of the objection is that the jury was instructed that a recovery in favor of the plaintiff might be had under the common money counts of the declaration, and this is alleged for error. If so, however, it did not prejudice the defendants; for, as we have already seen, a recovery might be had upon the contract, considered as an executory contract for the purchase by the defendants of the stock in question, under the second special count. In addition to that, so far as the bill of exceptions shows, it might well be that there was proof in the case, not only of a tender of the stock, but of an actual delivery and acceptance. In that case the contract would have been completely executed on the part of the plaintiff, title to the stock passing by the delivery to the defendants. In such a case, the charge would be entirely correct, and a recovery might be had under the common counts.

5. The fifth bill of exceptions is based upon an alleged error in the following portion of the charge:

"On the face of the papers the question is whether there was any loan at all. There is no usury unless there is a loan of money; and the question is whether the transaction involved a loan or attempted loan of money. We have looked at these papers carefully, and we instruct you that there is no evidence on their face that there was any intention to loan between the plaintiff and the defendant whereby usury could arise.

"It is our duty to give you instructions on that subject, and we say to you that upon that point the defense of the defendant must fail."

This charge is correct. There is nothing upon the face of the papers to show that the transaction was a loan of money by the plaintiff to the defendants, or to the Blair Iron and Steel Company. Unless there was a loan there can [496] be no usury. The bill of exceptions sets out no evidence to show the transaction to have been different from what it appears to be on the face of the papers.

This covers all the points raised upon the record. We find no error in the proceedings of the Circuit Court, and its judgment is accordingly affirmed.

LOUISE BERNEY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 241-255.)

Equitable estoppel—character of—when court of equity may enforce—injunction against setting up certain facts in action at law—demurrer, improperly sustained.

1. In order to justify a resort to a court of equity to enforce an equitable estoppel, it is necessary to show some ground of equity other than the estoppel itself, whereby the party entitled to the benefit of it is prevented from making it available in a court of law. The case shown must be one where the forms of the law are used to defeat that which, in equity, constitutes the right.

2. Upon a bill, filed in aid of the defense of an action at law brought by one of the defendants as executrix of her deceased husband, who died in France, for an injunction against setting up or claiming in such action that the decedent was not domiciled in Alabama; that his will was not duly admitted to probate there; that the administration thereunder of the sole executor and his attorney were not valid and binding; and against using in support of such allegations certain ancillary letters of administration, alleged to have been fraudulently and unlawfully procured to be issued to or in the name of said defendant, it is held: that the facts alleged amount to an equitable estoppel which is enforcible in equity.

Argued May 11, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Opinion below, 16 Fed. Rep. 522. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Wayne MacVeagh and C. E. Tracy, for appellants:

Such of the defenses to the claim of defendant as are of equitable cognizance must be availed of by bill in equity; as the fusion of law and equity which prevails under state practice does not obtain in the federal courts.

Northern Pac. R. R. Co. v. Paine, 119 U. S. 562 (ante, 518).

All of the defenses which complainants here allege are cognizable in equity alone, for the reason that the matters arise out of acts which the defendants have performed as individuals; whereas, the action at law is in the name of an executrix, whose right as such is derived from an independent and isolated proceeding upon the will, which not only ignores, but enables her to contest the validity of what was done previous to her acquisition of her present right, as well as the satisfaction to the real parties in interest made by St. James, the alleged wrong doer.

The estoppel arising thereon is not a legal one, because it does not arise out of privity of contract or of estate, but is purely equitable—as it arises out of what the beneficiaries themselves did before Louise Berney obtained her present authority. The settlement between the defendants and St. James is probably no defense to the action at law.

An equitable estoppel is sufficient ground or basis for equitable relief.

Bispham, Eq. §§ 280-282.

"It is now a well established principle that where the true owner of property holds out another, or allows him to appear, as the owner of or as having full power of disposition over the property, and innocent third parties are thus led into dealing with such apparent owner, they will be protected."

Bigelow, Estoppel, 484, and authorities cited.

The complainants have not "a plain, adequate and complete remedy at law."

Boyce's Exrs. v. Grundy, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 210 (7: 655); Watson v. Sutherland, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 74 (18: 580); Barber v. Barber, 62 U. S. 21 How. 582 [16: 226]; Oelrichs v. Spain, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 211 (21: 43); Sullivan v. R. R. Co. 94 U. S. 811 (24: 326); Crane v. McCoy, 1 Bond, 422, Baker v. Biddle, 1 Baldw. 394; Harrison v. Rowan, 4 Wash. C. C. 205.

A precedent for this case is found in Brown v. Pacific Mail St. Sh. Co. 5 Blatchf. 525, where an injunction was sought against anticipated ex parte proceedings affecting an election of directors about to be held, and for error or fraud for which there was a remedy at law.

Messrs. Franklin B. Lord and George De Forest Lord, for appellee:

If the matters complained of could be availed of by the complainants, as matter of defense in the actions at law brought against them, the complaint was rightly dismissed, for they had, on that assumption, "a plain, adequate and complete remedy at law."

While the doctrine of equitable estoppel originated and was promulgated by courts of chancery, it is now recognized and enforced as liberally in courts of law as in courts of equity.

Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 578 (25: 618).

The complainants, therefore, can avail themselves of the estoppel as a defense at law, and there is no necessity for their seeking affirmative relief in equity; nor does the alleged fraud in obtaining letters testamentary to Madam Berney furnish any ground for equitable interference, for the allegations in such proceedings only establish jurisdiction in the absence of fraud; and fraud, if it exists as the complainants allege, will undoubtedly be available to them in any action in which the proceedings may be used in evidence.

N. Y. Code of Procedure, § 2478.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court: [242]

This is a bill in equity filed by the appellants, some of whom are citizens of Pennsylvania and others of New York, against the appellee, who is an alien, a citizen of the Republic of France, and William Berney, a citizen of Texas, and Saffold Berney, Chollet Berney, Robert Berney, Phillipa Rousseau, Sophia White, Ann M. Ball, Phillipa E. Harley, Laurent B. Hallonquist, Robert L. Hallonquist, and William

C. Hallonquist, citizens of the State of Alabama. Of these defendants, none were served with process or appeared, except the appellee, [243] Louise Berney. The cause was heard in the circuit court on a general demurrer filed by the appellee to the bill. The demurrer was sustained, and the bill dismissed for want of equity. The complainants appealed.

The following statement of the case, as made by the bill, is taken from the brief filed by counsel for the appellants:

The bill alleges in substance:

1. That said Robert Berney, the decedent, made his will November 2, 1864, at Croydon, England, whereby he bequeathed his residuary estate to his executors therein named as trustees and upon trusts, among others, for the benefit of his widow, the defendant Louise Berney, and of the other persons named as defendants; and afterwards, on the 25th of September, 1874, a codicil thereto, making changes in some of the bequests in his will, and appointing as executors and trustees of his will the defendant Louise Berney; also James Berney, his brother; a Mr. Messier de St. James, of Paris, France, and John Drummond and William Drummond.

2. That Robert Berney died at Paris, France, November 19, 1874, leaving him surviving his widow, the defendant Louise Berney, his said brother, James Berney, and nephews and nieces, who are named as defendants in the bill of complaint. His widow was a native of France, and was with him at the time of his death, but his said brother James and his nephews and nieces were all citizens and residents of Montgomery County, Alabama; said St. James was a resident of France, and the Messrs. Drummond, of England. The decedent left personal estate in France, England, and the United States.

3. At the time of his death, Robert Berney, the decedent, was a citizen of the United States, who had lived abroad for some years, but had never acquired a domicil in France under or in accordance with its laws. Upon his death his widow, the defendant Louise Berney, presented the will and codicil of the decedent to the proper judicial authority in France, and, in accordance with French law, the administration of the estate was committed to a notary by competent judicial authority, December 4, 1874.

[244] 4. Subsequently, and before anything else was done, and on the application of said James Berney, the brother of decedent, and one of his executors, the will and codicil were formally admitted to probate, and letters testamentary thereon issued to said James Berney alone, by competent judicial authority at Montgomery, Alabama, on the 8th of February, 1875, the decree of the Alabama court being that the decedent was domiciled at Montgomery, Alabama, and that it had full jurisdiction in the premises. All of the heirs at law and next of kin of the decedent, except the widow, the defendant Louise Berney, were at that time citizens and residents of Alabama, and by the laws of Alabama such probate and issue of letters testamentary cannot be impeached collaterally, and are conclusive upon all persons and parties.

5. That said James Berney, having been thus constituted sole executor, gave a full power of attorney to said St. James, empowering him, among other things, to reduce the decedent's estate to possession, and to sell any and all property, etc. About the same time and on the 9th of March, 1875, said James Berney, being thus sole executor by reason of the Alabama probate, obtained the issue to himself, by the Surrogate or Court of Probate in the City of New York, of ancillary letters testamentary, based upon the Alabama probate. This adjudication is in due form, and also remains unimpaired and in full force. All of the said proceedings of said James Berney were known to the defendant Louise Berney and the other persons named as executors, as well as to the legatees under the will, the other defendants in the bill of complaint.

6. That at the time of the decedent's death, certain evidences of title of the personal property left by him were in his possession at Paris, France, and the purpose and intention of the proceedings above mentioned was to secure immunity of the decedent's estate from taxation in France, and to provide for the due and lawful administration of the assets, which were then actually in the possession of the widow, the defendant Louise Berney, and said St. James; and by the joint action of the sole qualified executor, said James Berney, said St. James and said defendant Louise Berney, be- [245] fore the notary to whom the matter had been so judicially committed in France, as aforesaid, the whole estate and its administration was intrusted to said St. James, as attorney for said James Berney, executor, with the knowledge and approval of all parties in interest, including the defendants. Formal proceedings were afterwards had before the notary of Paris, on the 30th and 31st of March and the 3d and 4th of May, 1875, and afterwards on the 11th of June, 1875, and on those dates formal documents or records were duly executed by the parties before the notary: the first, by the widow, the defendant Louise Berney, and said St. James; and the second, by the same persons in connection with said James Berney, the qualified executor, in person. At these proceedings and in the notarial instruments or records it was formally evidenced and declared that the decedent was at the time of his death domiciled at Montgomery, Alabama, that the probate of the will in Alabama was regular and valid, and that said James Berney was the sole qualified executor, and his power of attorney substituted said St. James in all the executor's functions and rights; and the defendant Louise Berney acknowledged receipt of the legacies given to her by the will from the administration of the estate thus constituted. By the laws of France, neither the defendant Louise Berney, nor any other of the persons named as executors in the will, nor anyone claiming under them, is permitted to assert the contrary of any of the matters thereby established.

7. That among other assets the decedent left $200,000 in United States bonds; $12,500 in stock of the U. S. Mortgage Co.; $58,200 in stock of the N. Y. Central & H. R. R. R. Co.; £8,000 in bonds of the N. Y. & Canada R. R. Co.; £3,000 bond and mortgage on real estate in England, and moneys on deposit with bankers at London. Of these items said James Berney, in person, took possession of and sold the $12,500 in stock of the U. S. Mortgage Co. and the $58,200 in stock of the N. Y. Central & H. R. R. R. Co. On the 15th of June, 1875, the [246] defendant Louise Berney and said St. James procured proof of the will and codicil in common form, and the issue of letters testamentary to them by a competent court in England, and having taken possession of the £8,000 in bonds of the N. Y. & Canada R. R. Co., and the £3,000 bond and mortgage on real estate in England, by virtue of their English letters got in and converted into money the assets in England, as to the last mentioned item, an instrument having been jointly executed by all three of the parties, Louise Berney, St. James and James Berney. All these proceedings were had without objection on the part of any of the defendants. The $200,000 of United States bonds were sent to this country, and by agents of said St. James at the City of New York presented to complainants, with directions to change the bonds from registered to bearer bonds by selling the registered bonds, and with the proceeds buying bearer or coupon bonds of the same issue, the only method of effecting such exchange. The agents of said St. James furnished to the officers of the United States Treasury satisfactory evidence of their authority to transfer the bonds, and upon which the bonds were transferred, and the complainants sold the registered bonds and with the proceeds bought $195,000 of coupon bonds, and with a sum in money representing the difference delivered the same to the agents of said St. James, who, in their turn, delivered the same to said St. James himself after he and the defendant Louise Berney had taken out their letters testamentary in England.

8. That legacies given by the will and codicil to several of the defendants were duly received by them from James Berney or said St. James under the administration of the estate so established, and during all the times mentioned said James Berney was the agent for, and actual guardian of, the defendants, and had full knowledge of all the aforesaid transactions.

9. That in the year 1880 said James Berney sent his son, the defendant Saffold Berney, to France, who then and there, acting as attorney and agent for his father in his quality of executor, and for himself and defendants as legatees, instituted judicial proceedings against said St. James for an account of his administration of the decedent's estate, and finally received from [247] said St. James, in full satisfaction and discharge of his liability to them, certain property. Because St. James has since died, and because of the laws and customs of France, complainants cannot ascertain the precise details of the transaction.

10. That the defendants now claim that said St. James diverted the $195,000 in coupon bonds and the money so received by him in exchange for the $200,000 United States registered bonds, and that the Alabama probate so obtained by said James Berney was invalid, because, as they now assert, the decedent was domiciled in France. The defendants have confederated together to assert and maintain this claim by means as follows: They have obtained from the Surrogate of New York County a second issue of ancillary letters testamentary to the defendant Louise Berney alone, based upon the false representation that the decedent's will had been admitted to probate in England in such manner as to justify the issue of ancillary letters testamentary here, and the false representation that there were unadministered assets in New York, and the fraudulent suppression of the facts concerning the former issue of letters ancillary to James Berney, founded upon the Alabama probate, and thereupon have brought an action at law in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, in the name of said defendant, Louise Berney, as sole executrix under and by virtue of the letters so issued to her, against the complainants, for conversion of said $200,000 United States bonds, and wherein they allege that said decedent was domiciled in France, and the said Alabama probate was invalid for that reason; and that the letters testamentary so issued to the defendant, Louise Berney, are conclusive upon the complainants, so far as her right to bring and maintain said action is concerned. Complainants are not permitted by law to procure the cancellation of said letters, or to contest the validity thereof. In view of the foregoing, complainants insist that the defendants are estopped in equity from now asserting against them that said decedent was not domiciled elsewhere than at Montgomery, Alabama, or that the proceedings of the executors at Paris are not binding upon them. Complainants also allege that the several mat- [248] ters and things above mentioned may not be pleaded and do not constitute a defense to the action at law, etc.

11. That, in addition to the action at law in the federal court before referred to, the defendants have brought another action in the Supreme Court of the State of New York in their own names as plaintiffs against the complainants, wherein they make the like claim as to Robert Berney's domicil and the Alabama probate of his will, and assert that they are the owners of the $200,000 United States bonds, and that complainants have converted them, etc.

12. That, according to the French law, the defendant Louise Berney, as the widow of the decedent, would have been entitled to a certain portion of his estate, had he been domiciled in France. The portion she would have received under the French law, had the right been claimed or asserted by her, was much more than the value of the $200,000 of United States bonds, and consequently she cannot maintain the action at law in the right or interest of her codefendants, if it be true that decedent was domiciled in France, until an accounting shall have been had between her and the legatees under the will.

13. And that the defendants are all beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and the defendant Louise Berney is an alien and resident of France, where her testimony cannot be taken by any ordinary process because of the laws of France; that the facts are within the knowledge of defendants and a discovery is necessary, etc., etc.

The relief sought was an injunction against setting up or claiming in the action at law or elsewhere that the decedent was not domiciled at Montgomery, Alabama; that his will was not duly admitted to probate there; and that the administration thereunder of said James Berney, as sole executor, and said St. James, as his attorney, were not valid and binding, and against using in support of such allegations the ancillary letters testamentary, which defendants have fraudulently and unlawfully procured to be issued to or in the name of the defendant Louise Berney, discovery of the facts within defendants' knowledge, etc.

It does not as distinctly appear from the bill itself as from this statement, that the first action at law, referred to, was brought and is pending in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. It may, however, perhaps be fairly inferred from the [252] allegations of the bill that such is the fact; and as it has been so assumed in the argument of the cause, no question is made upon the sufficiency of the bill in that respect. The only ground here urged in support of the decree and of the demurrer to the bill is that the complainants, upon the case made in the bill, have a complete and adequate defense at law, and that, consequently, they do not bring themselves within the jurisdiction of a court of equity.

If the decedent, Robert Berney, at the time of his death was domiciled in France, and not in Alabama, the letters testamentary issued to his brother James Berney, as executor in Alabama, were void, and the authority given by James Berney to St. James by the power of attorney was also invalid, and the payment made by the appellants to St. James of the proceeds of the sales of the bonds which belonged to the estate does not bind the rightful executor or protect the complainants. The ground of the bill therefore is that, upon these facts, an action at law may be successfully maintained by the appellee as executrix of Robert Berney against the complainants for the value of the bonds. The question is whether the other facts set up in the bill furnish a complete and adequate defense to such an action at law, or whether they establish a right in equity to relief. The rule as laid down by this court in Boyce's Exr. v. Grundy, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 210 [7:655], is that "It is not enough that there is a remedy at law. It must be plain and adequate; or, in other words, as practical and efficient to the ends of justice and its prompt administration as the remedy in equity." And, as appears by that case, the principle is as applicable in cases where a complainant resorts to a court of equity to enforce a defense to an action at law, as where he seeks by a bill in equity other relief. This is illustrated by the case of Grand Chute v. Winegar, 82 U.S. 15 Wall. 373 [21: 174]. That was a case of a bill in equity by a municipal corporation to procure the cancellation of bonds on which an action at law had been brought, alleged to be void in the hands of the holder. The court said: "A judgment against Winegar in the suit brought by him would be as conclusive upon [253] the invalidity of the bonds, would as effectually prevent all future vexatious litigation, would expose the fraud, and prevent future deception as perfectly and thoroughly as would a judgment in the equity suit. Under such circumstances, there is no authority for bringing this suit in equity."

The ground of relief alleged in the present bill is that by her acts and conduct the appellee has estopped herself, as against the complainants, from asserting any fact which annuls the executorship of James Berney under the Alabama probate, and the authority of St. James as his attorney in fact. Estoppels of this character, as distinguished from estoppels by record or by deed, are called equitable estoppels. It is not meant thereby that they are cognizable only in courts of equity, for they are commonly enforced in actions at law, as was fully shown in Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 578 [25:618]. But it does not follow, because equitable estoppels may originate legal as distinguished from equitable rights, that it may not be necessary in particular cases to resort to a court of equity in order to make them available. All that can properly be said is that, in order to justify a resort to a court of equity, it is necessary to show some ground of equity other than the estoppel itself, whereby the party entitled to the benefit of it is prevented from making it available in a court of law. In other words, the case shown must be one where the forms of the law are used to defeat that which, in equity, constitutes the right. Such a case is one for equitable interposition.

A close analogy is found in the doctrine of equitable set-off. The rule regulating the right of set-off is the same both at law and in equity; and yet there are many cases where set-offs not permissible at law may be enforced in equity. As was said by Mr. Justice Story in Green v. Darling, 5 Mason, 201, 209: "Now, the general rule in equity is, like that at law, that there can be no set-off of joint debts against separate debts, unless some new equity justify it. Such an equity may arise under circumstances of fraud; or where the party seeking relief is only a surety for a debt really separate; or where there are a series of transactions in which [254] joint credit is given with reference to the separate debt." * * * P. 212. "Since the statutes of set-off of mutual debts and credits courts of equity have generally followed the course adopted in the construction of the statutes by courts of law; and have applied the doctrine to equitable debts; they have rarely if ever broken in upon the decisions at law, unless some other equity intervened which justified them in granting relief beyond the rules of law, such as has been already alluded to." In Downer v. Dana, 17 Vt. 518, Judge Redfield said: "Although a court of equity will not, any more than a court of law, allow a set-off of joint debts against separate debts, yet there are many exceptions. One important exception is where the debts are in reality mutual, although not so in form, as where one of the joint debtors is a mere surety." In Smith v. Felton, 43 N.Y. 419, the court said: "Equity will look through the form of the transaction, and adjust the equities of the parties with a view to its substance, rather than its form, so long as no superior equities of third persons will be affected by such adjustment." In such cases, equity looks to the beneficial ownership of the debt. Kerr, Injunctions, 64, chap. 4, sec. 5.

The principle of these cases applies, we think, to the present. The ground of equity jurisdiction asserted in the bill is that the estoppel relied on would be good at law as against Louise Berney in her individual right, but not against her in her representative capacity as executrix of the estate of her deceased husband under the New York letters testamentary; but that it is good against her in equity in that capacity to the extent of her own individual interest, and the interest of any distributees of the estate equally bound thereby, in the fund which she is seeking as executrix at law to recover. She sues at law as executrix for the purpose of recovering a sum in dispute for the general benefit of the estate to be applied to the payment of creditors, legatees, and other distributees. Under the law of France as widow, and under the will as beneficiary, she is individually entitled to some as yet undetermined portion of the assets of the estate, after the payment of creditors, if there are any unpaid. Others named as defendants, similarly bound by the transactions relied upon as an estoppel, are also beneficially interested in the distribution of the estate in some yet unascertained proportions. There may be others entitled to some portion of the estate on distribution, in respect to whom the defense relied upon does not apply. As between them and the appellee and other beneficiaries it may be necessary to have an account of what they have received, and of what they are still to receive, and an adjustment upon equitable grounds, based on the right of the appellants to enforce the recognition of their payment to St. James as an agent whose authority the appellee and some of the other distributees cannot in equity be allowed to question. In the action at law, the appellee represents the whole estate, and everyone interested in its collection and distribution. It may very well happen, therefore, that in the action at law the right to prove the facts on which the estoppel rests may be questioned and denied, on the ground that the plaintiff in the action at law is not bound as executrix for what she did and assented to in her character as widow and legatee.

On this ground, therefore, and because it appears to be altogether uncertain whether the appellants can avail themselves in the action brought against them at law of the defense asserted in this bill, and admitted by the demurrer to be true, we think the demurrer should have been overruled, and the defendant required to answer. For error in this particular the decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to take further proceedings therein as equity and justice may require. It is accordingly so ordered.

MAURICE GANDY, Appt.,

v.

E. M. MARBLE, as Commissioner of Patents, AND HIS SUCCESSOR in Office as Such, for the Time Being.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 432-440.)

Patent law—application—limitation under statute—application to proceeding by bill in equity.

1. Under section 4894, R. S., an application for a patent is regarded as abandoned if the applicant fails to prosecute the same within two years after any action therein of which notice shall have been given him. This limitation affects a proceeding by bill in equity under section 4915, R. S., on the refusal to grant an application for a patent.

2. The presumption of abandonment, under section 4894, R. S., unless it is shown that the delay in prosecuting the application for two years and more after the last prior action, of which notice was given to the applicant, was unavoidable, exists as fully in regard to that branch of the application involved in the remedy by bill in equity, as in regard to any other part of the application.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. William A. Maury, Asst. Atty-Gen., for appellees.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

[433]

This is an appeal by the plaintiff in a suit in equity brought in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia against the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Patents, from a decree of the General Term of that court dismissing the bill. The suit was brought by Maurice Gandy against H. M. Teller, as Secretary of the Interior, and E. M. Marble, as Commissioner of Patents. The bill was founded upon section 4915 of the Revised Statutes, which provides as follows:

"Sec. 4915. Whenever a patent on application is refused, either by the Commissioner of Patents or by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia upon appeal from the commissioner, the applicant may have remedy by bill in equity; and the court having cognizance thereof, on notice to adverse parties and other due proceedings had, may adjudge that such applicant is entitled, according to law, to receive a patent for his invention, as specified in his claim, or for any part thereof, as the facts in the case may appear. And such adjudication, if it be in favor of the right of the applicant, shall authorize the commissioner to issue such patent on the applicant filing in the Patent Office a copy of the adjudication, and otherwise complying with the requirements of law. In all cases, where there is no opposing party, a copy of the bill shall be served on the commissioner; and all the expenses of the proceeding shall be paid by the applicant, whether the final decision is in his favor or not."

The facts of the case are these: On the first of December, 1877, Gandy filed in the Patent Office an application for a patent for "improvements in belts or bands for driving machinery." The application was rejected on the merits. After due proceedings, an appeal was taken to the Commissioner of Patents in person, who, on the 7th of April, 1879, affirmed the decision rejecting the application. Gandy appealed to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, which, on a hearing, and on the 30th of January, 1880, dismissed the petition of Gandy, and directed that a copy of its decree be transmitted to the Commissioner of Patents. The bill states that the ground of the action of the Patent Office and of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in rejecting the application was [434] that the invention was not patentable, having been anticipated in prior patents. The bill alleges that the application was erroneously rejected, and prays that the court will hear and determine the right of the plaintiff to a patent for what he claims, or for such parts thereof as he may be justly entitled to, and will decree accordingly.

The bill was filed on the third of May, 1883. A subpœna was issued upon it, and served upon the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Patents, on the 5th of May, 1883. On the 19th of October, 1883, the solicitor for the plaintiff served on the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Patents, in person, a notice that he would, on the next day, move the court for leave to enter their default in the case, and thereupon to proceed with the cause ex parte to final hearing. On the 20th of October, 1883, the court made an order setting forth that the process of the court and a copy of the bill had been duly served upon the defendants, that they had not appeared or answered, and that, on proofs of service of the above named motion, no one appearing for the defendants, it was ordered that the plaintiff have leave to enter the default of the defendants and to proceed with the cause ex parte, and that he have sixty days to take and put in his proofs. It also specified the officers before whom proofs might be taken. Documentary and oral proofs were put in, the former including a copy of the proceedings in the Patent Office by which it appeared that the date of the last proceeding in the application was the making of the decree of January 30, 1880, by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. No one appeared for the defendants on the taking of any of the proofs. On the 14th of April, 1884, the Supreme Court, in Special Term, no one appearing for the defendants, made an order that the cause be heard in the first instance by the General Term. On the 30th of April, 1884, Benjamin Butterworth, having succeeded Mr. Marble as Commissioner of Patents, moved the court, in General Term, to dismiss the bill and set aside the order entering the default of the defendants, and for leave to make a defense in the cause, assigning as grounds for the motion that the Secretary of the Interior was not a [435] proper party to the suit; that Mr. Butterworth had succeeded Mr. Marble as Commissioner of Patents; and that the application for the patent had been abandoned by reason of the failure to prosecute the same within two years after the last action thereon, of which notice was duly communicated to the applicant. The court in General Term made an order allowing the plaintiff to amend his bill, striking out the name of the Secretary of the Interior as a defendant and adding as a defendant the successor in office of Mr. Marble. On the same day, the court in General Term made a decree, on a hearing of counsel for both parties, dismissing the bill, with costs. From that decree the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

We are of opinion that this decree must be affirmed. It is provided by section 4894 of the [439] Revised Statutes as follows:

"Sec. 4894. All applications for patents shall be completed and prepared for examination within two years after the filing of the application; and in default thereof, or upon failure of the applicant to prosecute the same within two years after any action therein, of which notice shall have been given to the applicant, they shall be regarded as abandoned by the parties thereto, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Patents that such delay was unavoidable."

The applicant failed to prosecute his application within two years after the last action therein, of which notice was given to the applicant. The decree of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia was made on the 30th of January, 1880, and this bill was not filed until the third of May, 1883. No excuse for the laches and delay is set up in the bill, and none is shown in the proofs, nor is it alleged in the bill that the delay was unavoidable. Although, as was said by this court in Butterworth v. U. S. 112 U. S. 50, 61 [28:656, 659] (citing Whipple v. Miner, 15 Fed. Rep. 117; Ex parte Squire, 8 Ban. & Ard. 133; and Butler v. Shaw, 21 Fed. Rep. 821), the proceeding by bill in equity, under section 4915, on the refusal to grant an application for a patent, intends a suit according to the ordinary course of equity practice and procedure, and is not a technical appeal from the Patent Office, nor confined to the case as made in the record of that office, but is prepared and heard upon all competent evidence adduced and upon the whole merits, yet the proceeding is, in fact and necessarily, a part of the application for the patent. Section 4915 declares that the judgment of the court, if in favor of the right of the applicant, is to be a judgment that the applicant "is entitled, according to law, to receive a patent for his invention, as specified in his claim, or for any part thereof, as the facts in the case may appear;" and that, if the adjudication be in favor of the right of the applicant, it shall authorize the commissioner to issue the patent, on the filing in the Patent Office, by the applicant, of a copy of the adjudication, and on his "otherwise complying with the requirements of law." One requirement of law is, by section 4894, that the application shall be regarded as abandoned if the applicant fails to prosecute the same within two years after any action therein of which no- [440] tice shall have been given to him, "unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Patents that such delay was unavoidable." All that the court which takes cognizance of the bill in equity, under section 4915, is authorized to do is to adjudge whether or not "the applicant is entitled, according to law, to receive a patent," and, after an adjudication in his favor to that effect, the commissioner is not authorized to issue a patent unless the applicant otherwise complies with the requirements of law. In the present case, there would be no compliance with the requirements of law, in view of the delay for more than two years, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that the delay was unavoidable. The jurisdiction of the application being transferred, pro tanto, to the court, by virtue of the bill in equity, it cannot adjudge that the applicant is entitled, according to law, to receive a patent, unless he shows to the satisfaction of the court that the delay was unavoidable, under an allegation to that effect in the bill. The presumption of abandonment, under section 4894, unless it is shown that the delay in prosecuting the application for two years and more after the last prior action, of which notice was given to the applicant, was unavoidable, exists as fully in regard to that branch of the application involved in the remedy by bill in equity as in regard to any other part of the application, whether so much of it as is strictly within the Patent Office, or so much of it as consists of an appeal to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia under section 4911. The decision of the court on a bill in equity becomes, equally with the judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia on a direct appeal under section 4911, the decision of the Patent Office, and is to govern the action of the commissioner. It is, therefore, clearly a branch of the application for the patent, and to be governed by the rule as to laches and delay declared by section 4894 to be attendant upon the application.

Decree affirmed.

Practice — answer under oath — sufficiency of evidence to overcome — sales — fraud.

1. An answer under oath denying each and all of the allegations of fraud contained in the bill must be overcome by the satisfactory evidence of two witnesses, or of one witness corroborated by circumstances which are equivalent in weight to another, before the complainant can be granted the relief asked.

2. This court affirms the decree of the court below dismissing the bill, the evidence not being sufficient to justify a reversal.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Eppa Hunton and W. C. Belcher, for appellants.

Mr. Edward J. Pringle, for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity brought by several judgment creditors of the mercantile firm of Kennedy & Durr, to set aside a sale of the goods of the firm to Charles McDermot, under executions on judgments in his favor, on the ground of fraud, and to have the property and its proceeds in the hands of McDermot subjected to the payment of the amounts due them respectively. The bill called for answers under oath, and McDermot answered accordingly, denying each and all of the allegations of fraud which were made against him. This being responsive to the bill, his denials must be overcome by the satisfactory evidence of two witnesses, or of one witness corroborated by circumstances which are equivalent in weight to another, before the complainants can be granted the relief they ask. No such proof has been made. We have looked carefully through the whole evidence, and, while it is full of circumstances calculated to excite suspicion, there is not enough to justify us in reversing the decree of the court below dismissing the bill. The questions involved are principally of fact, [519] which it would serve no useful purpose to consider at length in an opinion.

The decree is affirmed.

HIRAM SIBLEY AND PAUL P. WINSTON, Assignee in Bankruptcy of LANCASTER, BROWN & Co.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 220–231.)

Partnership — settlement of accounts — sale of partnership property by a member of the firm — proceeds held as collateral security for debts of copartners to himself — construction of contract — objection, not taken below — jurisdiction.

Upon a bill for a settlement of the accounts of a partnership, formed June 20, 1872, between Hiram Sibley, R. F. Simonton and others, for the purpose of speculating in certain railroad bonds and stock, it is held:

a. That, under a certain clause in the partnership agreement, Sibley was not required immediately to apply the proceeds of a sale of the bonds and stock, or of a foreclosure of the mortgage securing the bonds, to the payment of the debts of his copartners to himself;

b. That he might hold the whole proceeds of such sale or foreclosure, just as he had previously held the bonds and stock, as collateral security for the payment of said debts, leaving the title to said proceeds in the partners respectively, in the proportions determined by the partnership agreement;

c. That Sibley is not chargeable with the par value of certain stock, which is now worthless, received by him on account of a sale of the bonds and stock; and,

d. That an objection, not taken below, that the bill cannot be maintained because the evidence shows an account stated on which an action at law would lie, is not supported by the evidence.

Argued Dec. 16, 1886. Decided May 27, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of North Carolina. Affirmed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was a bill in equity by Hiram Sibley, a citizen of New York, and Paul P Winston, assignee in bankruptcy of Lancaster, Brown & [221] Co., and a citizen of Virginia, against the executrix of Robert F. Simonton, a citizen of North Carolina, for a settlement of the accounts of a partnership formed June 20, 1872, by Sibley, Simonton, and Lancaster, Brown & Co., for the purpose of speculating in certain railroad bonds and stock, as shown in the two following agreements signed by them:

"New York, June 19, 1872. This agreement between Hiram Sibley, of Rochester, R. F. Simonton, of North Carolina, and Lancaster, Brown & Co., of New York, witnesseth: That the said Sibley agrees to sell to the said Simonton one half interest in all his right and title to $1,057,000 of the first mortgage bonds of the Western North Carolina Railroad Company now held by him ($500,000 of said bonds being signed by only one trustee), and now in hands of Lancaster, Brown & Co. for safe keeping, and eight thousand one hundred and fifty-eight shares of stock in said company, for the sum of $185,633, payable on the 14th day of March, 1873, and the said Simonton agrees to buy the said interest and to pay as aforesaid; and the said Sibley also agrees to sell the said Lancaster, Brown & Co. one fourth of all his right and title to the said bonds and stock, for the sum of $67,817, payable on 14th March, 1873, and the said Lancaster, Brown & Co. agree to buy the same and to pay as aforesaid. It is expressly understood that the aforesaid bonds and stock sold each party are to be considered as held by Hiram Sibley as collateral security for the prompt payment of the said sums of money, and the whole amount of bonds and stocks shall be held together, and that neither party to this contract shall sell or in any way dispose of the whole or any part of his interest in the same, without the consent of all of the other parties. But Hiram Sibley shall have the privilege of selling the whole amount of both bonds and stock at his discretion at any time, and apply the proceeds to the payment of said sums due to him, allowing a rebate at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, if the payment shall be thus received before maturity. It is further agreed that Hiram Sibley may, if deemed best by him, proceed to foreclose the mortgage securing said bonds, and to that end may em-[222] ploy counsel, the charge for which shall be borne by the parties in interest, in proportion to the amount of bonds and stock held by each; and whatever the proceeds of said foreclosure may be, or, if the bonds are sold, whatever the net proceeds of the sale may be, after paying the said sums of money and expenses of foreclosure, they shall be considered as due to each party in proportion as the bonds and stock are now held, but may be held by Hiram Sibley as collateral security for the payment of the aforesaid sums respectively."

"New York, June 20, 1872. Mr. Hiram Sibley having this day sold to R. F. Simonton one half of his interest in $1,057,000 first mortgage bonds of the Western North Carolina Railroad Company, and eight thousand one hundred and fifty-eight shares of the stock of said company, and to Lancaster, Brown & Co. one fourth interest in said bonds and stock, he himself holding the remaining one fourth interest, it is mutually agreed between all the parties that from any profits arising from the sale, foreclosure, or any other disposition of said bonds and stock, $35,108.75 shall be first set apart to be divided in three equal parts, Hiram Sibley, R. F. Simonton, and Lancaster, Brown & Co. each to have one third; from any profits remaining there shall be first paid to Lancaster, Brown & Co. the commission by them for sale of bonds and tax, amounting to $1348.20, and to the Western North Carolina Railroad Company $881.27 due to said company, and any balance remaining shall be divided as follows: Hiram Sibley one fourth; R. F. Simonton one half; Lancaster, Brown & Co. one fourth. In case of loss in this adventure, the amount due to Lancaster, Brown & Co. of $1,348.20, and to the Western North Carolina Railroad Company of $881.27, shall be paid by each of the parties in proportion to their interest, and in the same proportion any deficiency that may exist in the proceeds necessary to return to the said Hiram Sibley the sum of $271,266."

The other material facts, appearing by the master's report and the evidence taken in the case, were as follows:

Sibley brought a suit to foreclose the mortgage; and on November 7, 1872, by contract in [223] writing with one Wilson, agreed to sell him the aforesaid bonds and stock, and his interest in that suit, for the sum of $870,000, and acknowledged the receipt of $100,000 in part payment, but in fact received instead stock of the Southern Railway Security Company of this amount at its par value, which afterwards became worthless.

Sibley testified that he received this stock on the joint account of himself, Simonton, and Lancaster, Brown, & Co. Lancaster, who had obtained his discharge in bankruptcy, testified that he knew and informed Simonton that this stock had been so received; and that Simonton was kept by him fully informed of all negotiations pending and concluded from time to time for the sale of the bonds and stock of the partnership, and personally approved of them.

On April 25, 1874, Simonton, in a letter to Lancaster, Brown & Co., spoke of the pending proceedings for foreclosure, and said: "The trade with Wilson was a bad one; but we must stick to it, as Mr. Sibley made it in good faith."

On October 3, 1874, Simonton and Lancaster, Brown & Co. signed and sent to Sibley this power of attorney:

"New York, October 3, 1874. Whereas, we the undersigned, in connection with Hiram Sibley, Esq., became the purchaser of $1,057,000 of the first mortgage bonds of the Western North Carolina Railroad Company; and whereas, the said Sibley furnished nearly the whole amount of money paid for said bonds, and has not required us to pay him for our proportion of said cost, although the delay in realizing on said bonds has been much greater than was expected; and whereas, appreciating his liberality, and being anxious that he should recover his money thus invested in the shortest time possible, we have heretofore left to him the management of the adventure, we hereby authorize and request him to continue to direct the foreclosure proceedings against the said railroad company, or to take such other action, by sale of bonds or otherwise, as may in his judgment appear for the best interest of all concerned, hereby assuring him that whatever course he may deem best will be satisfactory to us."

On October 27, 1874, Wilson having failed to [224] carry out his contract by paying the rest of the consideration, Sibley sold the aforesaid bonds and stock of the Western North Carolina Railroad Company, subject to any claim of Wilson, to one Matthews for $270,000 paid in cash, with a stipulation that Sibley in any event should retain the $100,000 received by him from Wilson in stock of the Southern Railway Security Company.

On October 31, 1874, Sibley received on this stock a stock dividend of 50 per cent and a cash dividend of $3,500.

On December 24, 1874, Lancaster wrote a letter to Simonton, which was received, in which he said: "Mr. Sibley sold out to Mr. Matthews for $270,000, but in order to induce him to purchase had to lend him $200,000. We enclose a statement showing figures, as near as we can give them, of your indebtedness to Mr. Sibley and to ourselves, growing out of that transaction. To Mr. Sibley you will owe $14,364; to us $1,292.46. And Mr. Sibley will have to transfer to you, upon the payment of the aggregate amount, say $15,656.46, $75,000 of Southern Railway Security stock. That amount of that stock cannot be sold now to realize as much as $15,000, but it is said that it is intrinsically worth 25 cents in the dollar. We have written Mr. Sibley to send us his account against you, which I will send you as soon as received, but I don't think it will vary materially from that which I enclose."

In the statement enclosed, the amount due from Simonton to Sibley was made up by charging Simonton with the sum of $135,633, which he had agreed to pay Sibley by the agreement of partnership, and interest from March 14, 1873, to October 31, 1874, and crediting him as of the latter date with $135,000, half the proceeds of the sale to Matthews, and with half the cash dividend of $3,500 received by Sibley.

Lancaster testified that this statement was correct; and that Simonton made no objection to it in a conversation which they afterwards had in reference to the state of accounts between the parties to the adventure.

On February 23, 1875, Sibley drew up and sent to Simonton an account like that sent by Lancaster, Brown & Co., except in crediting [225] Simonton with half of the interest from March 14, 1873, to October 31, 1874, on the cash dividend, and charging him with half of certain expenses, thereby reducing the balance to $14,252.94.

On December 17, 1875, Lancaster wrote to Simonton, saying: "Mr. Sibley is here, and seems very much annoyed at not hearing from you in regard to your indebtedness to him growing out of that Western North Carolina Railroad bond transaction. He says he is not inclined to give you trouble, and is willing to make a liberal settlement; but a settlement he must insist on, and hopes you will not force him to bring suit against you."

On January 10, 1876, Simonton replied: "Your letter, with Mr. Sibley's request, received. I have been an invalid all last year, and Col. Tate has all my papers, and promised me to go to New York, see you and Mr. Sibley and make a settlement. He has not done so. I have forwarded your letter to him. I hope he will attend to this case. There is no use of a suit; all can be settled without."

Simonton died in 1876, and this bill was filed March 5, 1877.

The account rendered by Sibley to Simonton as aforesaid was adopted by the master as the true statement of accounts between them.

The defendant excepted to the master's report, "in that he did not charge the complainant, Hiram Sibley, with $100,000 of Southern Railway Security stock, with interest at 7 per cent, which the evidence shows the said Sibley received as cash at par value."

The circuit court overruled this exception and confirmed the master's report, and afterwards, upon the report of a special master showing that Simonton's estate was insolvent, entered a final decree in favor of Sibley for the sum of $5,191.85. The defendant appealed to this court.

Mr. S. F. Phillips, for appellant.
Mr. William E. Earle, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of [228]
the court:

The object of this bill is the settlement of the accounts of a partnership, the members of which were Sibley, Simonton, and the firm of Lancaster, Brown & Co.

By the original agreement in writing, dated June 19, 1872, which took the place of articles of partnership, the partnership property was to consist of a large quantity of bonds and stock of the Western North Carolina Railroad Company, previously held by Sibley; Simonton bought one half of Sibley's interest therein for the sum of $135,633, and Lancaster, Brown & Co. bought one fourth of Sibley's interest for $67,817; Sibley was to hold the same as collateral security for the payment to him of those sums; the whole amount of the bonds and stock was to be held together, and neither partner was to sell or dispose of the whole or any part of his interest without the consent of his copartners; but there were provisions authorizing Sibley to sell the whole property of the partnership, which will be considered presently.

Early in November, 1872, Sibley made a contract with Wilson to sell him the Western North Carolina Railroad bonds and stock, belonging to the partnership, for $100,000 in stock of the Southern Railway Security Company, which Wilson transferred to him, and $270,000 in cash, which Wilson did not pay; and in the latter part of October, 1874, Sibley sold the Western North Carolina Railroad bonds and stock to Matthews for the like sum of $270,000 paid in cash, with a stipulation that Sibley should retain the $100,000 of Southern Railway Security stock that he had received from Wilson. Sibley never received any money from this stock, except one cash dividend of $3,500.

The master has treated this stock as partnership property, and has charged Simonton's estate with his aforesaid debt to Sibley of $135,633, and interest, and credited him with $136,750, half of the sums received by Sibley in cash as aforesaid, showing, with the interest and expense account, a balance due Sibley of something more than $14,000.

The argument of the appellant, that Sibley should have been charged with the $100,000 of stock of the Southern Railway Security Company at its par value, is based upon the theory that Sibley, in selling the partnership property, acted, and was authorized to act, only as a cred- [229] itor of his copartners, and not as a partner on behalf of the partnership.

It cannot be denied that some of the provisions of the original agreement of partnership are consistent with this theory.

The agreement provides that Sibley "shall have the privilege of selling the whole amount of both bonds and stock at his discretion at any time, and apply the proceeds to the payment of the said sums due to him." If this were all, there might be some difficulty in construing Sibley's authority to sell as absolute and unqualified; and his "privilege of selling" might perhaps be considered as so coupled with a duty to "apply the proceeds" of any sale "to the payment of the said sums due to him," that he would be bound, if he sold the property, to apply the proceeds at once to the payment of those sums.

The agreement of June 19 next provides that Sibley may, if he thinks best, proceed to foreclose the mortgage by which the bonds were secured, "and whatever the proceeds of said foreclosure may be, or, if the bonds are sold, whatever the net proceeds of the sale may be, after paying the said sums of money and expenses of foreclosure, they shall be considered as due to each party in proportion as the bonds and stock are now held." This provision, again, if it had stopped here, might possibly have been understood as intended only to affirm the right of the partners to share, according to their respective interests, in the proceeds of either a foreclosure or a sale—the debt to Sibley, as well as the incidental expenses, being first paid out of those proceeds.

But this provision goes on and ends with these words: "but may be held by Hiram Sibley as collateral security for the payment of the aforesaid sums respectively." This clause, taken in connection with what goes before, cannot possibly mean that it is only the net proceeds, after deducting out of them the sums due to Sibley from his copartners, together with the incidental expenses, in the event of a foreclosure, or after deducting the sums due him from his copartners in the event of a sale, that are to be held by him "as collateral security for the payment of the aforesaid sums respectively;" for, after an application of the proceeds of a sale to the payment of those sums, either those sums would have been wholly paid if the proceeds were sufficient to pay them, or if they were insufficient, no proceeds would remain to be held as collateral security. The only reasonable construction of the clause is that Sibley, instead of immediately applying the proceeds, either of a sale or of a foreclosure, to the payment of the debts of his copartners to himself, may hold the whole proceeds, just as he previously held the bonds and stock, as collateral security for the payment of those debts, leaving the title to the proceeds after the sale or foreclosure, as the title to the bonds and stock was before, in the partners respectively, in the proportions determined by the partnership agreement.

The supplemental agreement of June 20, 1872, also, making special provisions for the distribution of "any profits arising from the sale, foreclosure, or any other disposition of said bonds," clearly implies, by the use of the word "profits," that any sale by Sibley might be made by him as a partner on behalf of the partnership, and not merely as a creditor enforcing his collateral security.

The view that the partnership agreement empowered Sibley to sell the property as managing partner, independently of his right as a creditor, is confirmed by the terms of the power of attorney given him by his copartners on October 3, 1874, by which they recited that they had "heretofore left to him the management of the adventure," and authorized and requested him, either to prosecute the proceedings for foreclosure, "or to take such other action, by sale of bonds or otherwise, as may in his judgment appear for the best interest of all concerned."

The Southern Railway Security Company stock is now worthless; and it is not proved, nor even contended, that Sibley neglected any opportunity of selling it and turning it into money. The only exception to the master's report relied on at the argument was that the master had not charged Sibley with this stock at its par value, and interest. Upon the true construction of the partnership agreement, and the proofs in the case, this exception was rightly overruled by the circuit court, because this stock was never received by Sibley as cash, or accepted by him as his own property in part payment of the sums due him from the other partners, but was received and afterwards held by him as property of the partnership, belonging to all the partners in the proportions stipulated in the original agreement.

The further objection has been taken for the first time in this court, that the bill cannot be maintained, because the evidence shows an account stated between Sibley and Simonton, on which an action at law would lie. It is a sufficient answer to this objection that the evidence does not show, and the master has not found, that an account was rendered by the one party and assented to by the other, but only that Sibley rendered to Simonton a statement of the account between them, which was not treated by either as an account stated, nor ever agreed to or settled, but remained open at the death of Simonton, and until its truth was established by the evidence in this suit against his executrix to settle the accounts of the partnership.

Decree affirmed.

Assignment laws of Mississippi—fraud—preferences, allowed—security to sureties—payment of debt due wife—supplies for wife of assignor.

1. The laws of Mississippi allow an insolvent debtor to make a general assignment of his property in which one or more of his creditors may be preferred to others.

2. A deed in the nature of a mortgage, to secure sureties on the grantor's note, does not affect the validity of a subsequent assignment, though made in contemplation of it. The same is true of a payment by the assignor of a debt due his wife before the assignment

3. A fraudulent disposition of property does not of itself impair a subsequent general assignment.

Submitted May 3, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Mississippi. Opinion below, 19 Fed. Rep. 714. Reversed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Field.

In March, 1882, one S. H. Gunter, a merchant who had been for many years engaged in business at Sardis, in Mississippi, was largely indebted to the complainants and others; and, being unable to pay them in full, made a general assignment of his property of every description, except such as was exempt from execution, to one S. G. Spain, as trustee, for their benefit, which was recorded the same day. The assignment preferred certain of the creditors, who are named in a schedule annexed. Among them were the complainants, Estes, Doan & Co., merchants at Memphis, in Tennessee. The [451] sum due them was $18,587.68, but they were preferred only to the amount of $10,000. Their claim grew out of advances of cash and supplies furnished to Gunter. There is no question as to its amount or justice. On the same day and immediately preceding the execution of the assignment, Gunter executed a deed of a house and lot in Sardis to one J. G. Hall, as trustee, to secure the firm of Boothe, Rice & Carleton, who were sureties upon his note, held by the bank of Sardis, for $1,000, due on the first of December, 1882. This deed was to be void if the note was paid at maturity; otherwise the trustee was, on the written request of the sureties, to take possession of and sell the property at public auction, after due notice, and apply the proceeds to its payment. Any surplus was to be returned to the grantor. If the property should at any time "become endangered" as a security, the trustee was at liberty to take possession of and hold it until the debt was discharged by payment or by sale of the property; but until demanded by the trustee the grantor was to hold the same subject to the deed of trust. This deed was also recorded on the same day and a few minutes before the assignment.

At the same time Gunter transferred and delivered to several of his clerks and employés certain notes and accounts in payment of his indebtedness to them. It was also in proof that Gunter was hopelessly insolvent; that for twelve days before he made the assignment he knew of his condition and contemplated making the assignment; that during this time he gave to his wife the sum of $900 in payment of an alleged indebtedness to her, and she was permitted to take money from the drawer of the store, and that more goods than usual were carried from the store to his house.

Soon after the assignment and deed of trust were recorded the defendants, Bickham & Moore, who were also creditors of Gunter, sued out an attachment against him in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Mississippi, which was levied on the property assigned by Gunter to Spain as trustee. This attachment was followed by attachments of other creditors, and the property was seized by the marshal. Spain, the assignee, thereupon renounced his trust and refused further to act. Thereupon the complainants, [452] Estes & Doan, who were much the largest creditors of Gunter, filed their bill against Bickham & Moore and other attaching creditors, setting forth the assignment of Gunter to Spain, his debt to them, the several attachments levied, and the refusal of Spain, the assignee, to act, and praying the court to appoint a trustee in his place, to direct the enforcement of the trust, and to enjoin the attaching creditors from further proceeding with their suits.

Bickham & Moore and other defendants answered, charging that the assignment was fraudulent and void, but admitting that Spain refused to act as trustee or assignee. Proofs were taken, and upon the hearing the court held that the assignment was fraudulent and void, and accordingly entered a decree dismissing the bill with costs. From this decree the complainants have appealed to this court.

Mr. Luke E. Wright, for appellants.

Messrs. H. M. Sullivan, W. V. Sullivan, and Edward Mayes, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from its opinion in the record that the court below held the assignment of Gunter for the benefit of his creditors to be fraudulent and void on these grounds: 1. Because of the execution of the trust deed to Hall to secure the sureties on his note held by the bank of Sardis. 2. Because of the payment of the $900 to his wife, shortly before the assignment, for a debt which he claims to have owed to her. 3. Because he permitted her to take money from the cash drawer; and 4, Because more supplies than usual were taken from the store to his house shortly before the assignment.

The answer to these objections is readily given, and it appears to us conclusive. The laws of Mississippi allow an insolvent debtor to make a general assignment of his property in which one or more of his creditors may be preferred to others. The assignment is not invalid, therefore, [455] because of the preferences given. In Eldridge v. Phillipson, 58 Miss. 270, 280, the Supreme Court of that State said: "The right to make a preference results from the dominion which the owner has over his property; it is a part of his proprietorship. The law has not said he shall divide his estate ratably among his creditors. It has left to him the discretion to act as he will, provided only he acts with the honest intent to pay a valid debt, and does not, under cover of such a disposition, stipulate for a benefit to himself."

Nor did the deed to Hall to secure the sureties on the assignor's note affect the validity of the assignment, though made in contemplation of it. Such security might have been provided in the assignment itself. The assignor had a right to use his property to protect parties who had become his sureties, as well as to pay existing debts. Until the assignment he could dispose of his property in any way he may have thought proper, so that he did not thereby defraud any of his creditors.

The court below seems to have concluded that the two instruments, the assignment and the deed to Hall, should be considered together, and, as the deed contained a proviso that the grantor was to remain in possession of the property until the note matured, and the sureties should request the trustee to take possession of the same, there was such a reservation for the benefit of the grantor as rendered the assignment invalid. The deed was in fact a mortgage of the property to secure against a prospective liability; and in such cases it is usual for the grantor or mortgagor to remain in possession of the property until the maturity of the obligation and a sale of the premises. Standing by itself, the deed was not open to any serious objection. And even that reservation was defeated by the assignment, which included the property in question with other property of the assignor, and provided that the assignee should take possession of the same and sell and dispose of it with all convenient diligence. The assignment was subsequent to the deed and carried all that could in any way be considered as a benefit secured by the deed to the assignor. [456] The creditors were not, therefore, in any way hindered or defrauded by the alleged reservation.

There is nothing in Gunter's payment to his wife of the $900 which can affect the validity of the assignment. Gunter's testimony is all that there was on the subject, and he testifies that she received the money from her grandfather, and that he borrowed it from her and used it. His statement is not contradicted. Under these circumstances he was not blameworthy in paying to his wife the amount he had used belonging to her. But, as counsel well observes, if that payment were fraudulent, it would not vitiate a subsequent assignment. A fraudulent disposition of property does not of itself impair a subsequent general assignment. The assignee may sue for its recovery, and, if successful, it will be for the benefit of the creditors precisely as if it had been included in the assignment. Wilson v. Berg, 88 Pa. 167; Reinhard v. Bank of Kentucky, 6 B. Mon. 252.

The same observation may be made as to the alleged taking of money by Mrs. Gunter from the cash drawer, and of his sending supplies from the store to his house. She was a clerk in the store and took the money from the drawer in the course of business, and supplies for Gunter's house were generally taken from the store. It was quite natural, therefore, that he should take needed supplies before the assignment was executed. There is no evidence that the supplies were excessive or unreasonable; but even if they were, that fact would constitute no ground for setting the subsequent assignment aside.

From a consideration of the whole case, we are clear there is no just ground shown by the record for disturbing the assignment. It follows that the decree below must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion; and it is so ordered.

LOUISVILLE AND NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 391-412.)

Removal of causes—citizenship—Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, a Kentucky corporation—action to recover damages to employé—gross negligence—instruction to find for defendant, sustained.

1. The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company is a Kentucky corporation. Tennessee, by the Act of December 4, 1851, did not create a new corporation but merely granted to said Company a license to exercise within her limits all or some of the powers conferred upon it by the State of Kentucky.

2. An action brought in a Tennessee court by a citizen of that State against said Company is removable.

3. When the evidence given at the trial, with all inferences that the jury could justifiably draw from it, is insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff, so that such a verdict, if returned, must be set aside, the court is not bound to submit the case to the jury, but may direct a verdict for the defendant.

4. In the case presented it is held: that the deceased, an employé of the defendant, was guilty of the grossest negligence in running his hand car into a deep cut where he was injured; that the defendant is not liable under sections 1166-1168 of the Tennessee Code; and that the court properly instructed the jury to find for the defendant.

Argued and submitted April 4, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Tennessee. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. F. E. Williams, for plaintiff in error:

The defendant Company was first chartered by the State of Kentucky. It was also chartered by the State of Tennessee; and its status is the same in Tennessee as if it had been originally created by that State, because that State adopted it.

Muller v. Dows, 94 U. S. 447 (24: 208); Uphoff v. St. Louis etc. R. R. Co. 5 Fed. Rep. 547; R. Co. v. Whitton's Admr. 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 270 (20: 571).

The question is always a question of intent (R. R. Co. v. Harris, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 83 (20: 358); and all the statutes which relate to the question must be read by themselves.

R. R. Cos. v. Schutte, 103 U. S. 140 (26: 335).

One State can make a corporation of another State, as there organized and conducted, a corporation of its own, quoad any property within its territorial jurisdiction.

Graham v. Boston, H. & E. R. R. Co. 118 U. S. 161, 168 (ante, 196); R. R. Co. v. Harris, supra.

And this is allowable, for the reason that a corporation of one State has no existence as a legal entity or person in another State, except under and by virtue of its incorporation by the latter State.

Memphis & C. R. R. Co. v. Alabama, 107 U. S. 585 (27: 520); Muller v. Dows, supra.

If there is any evidence tending to prove the issue on either side, it is error to withdraw the case from the jury.

Hickman v. Jones, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 197 (19: 551); Manchester v. Ericsson, 105 U. S. 347 (26: 1099); U. S. v. Tillotson, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 180 (6: 594).

Directions to find for a party can only be given where there is no conflicting evidence.

Klein v. Russell, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 433 (22: 116); Moulor v. Ins. Co. 101 U. S. 708 (25: 1077).

A case should not be withdrawn from a jury unless the facts are undisputed or testimony so conclusive that a verdict in conflict with it would be set aside.

Conn. Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Lathrop, 111 U. S. 612 (28: 536) Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Doster, 106 U. S. 30 (27: 65).

It is true, the rule is, that when the evidence given at the trial, with all the inferences which the jury could justifiably draw from it, is insufficient to support a verdict, so that such verdict, if returned, must be set aside, the court may direct a verdict for the defendant.

Schofield v. Chicago M. & St. P. R. Co. 114 U. S. 619 (29: 225).

Mr. Ed. Baxter, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought in the Circuit Court of Williamson County, Tennessee, by Simon Callahan, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him while in the discharge [392] of his duties as section foreman on a railroad between Nashville, Tennessee, and Decatur, Alabama, which, at the time, was operated by the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company. The declaration alleges that the defendant is a corporation created by the Legislature of Tennessee, and that the injuries complained of were caused by the negligence and carelessness of that Company, its servants, and agents. In due time, the defendant filed its petition, accompanied by bond in proper form, for the removal of the action into the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Tennessee—alleging that the plaintiff was a citizen of Tennessee, and that the defendant was a citizen of Kentucky, having its principal place of business in that Commonwealth. The state court made an order recognizing the right of removal, and declaring that no further proceedings be had therein in said suit.

In the circuit court, a motion to remand the cause to the state court—the ground of such motion being that the defendant was a corporation of Tennessee, and, therefore, a citizen of the same State with the plaintiff—was denied. To that action of the court an exception was taken.

Upon the trial of the case the court gave a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant. It also refused to give the instructions asked in behalf of the plaintiff.

The first question presented by the assign- [401] ments of error relates to the refusal by the court below to remand the action to the state court. If the defendant is a corporation of Kentucky, then its right to have the case removed from the state court cannot be denied.

Whether a corporation created by the laws of one State is also a corporation of another State within whose limits it is permitted, under legislative sanction, to exert its corporate powers, is often difficult to determine. This is apparent from the former decisions of this court. To some of those decisions it will be well to refer, before entering upon the examination of the particular Statutes of Tennessee, which it is claimed created the defendant a corporation of that State.

In Ohio & M. R. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 286, 293, 297 [17: 130, 133], it was a question whether that company was not a corporation both of Indiana and Ohio. The company, claiming in its declaration to be "a corporation created by the laws of the States of Indiana and [402] Ohio, and having its principal place of business in Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio, a citizen of the State of Ohio," sued Wheeler, a citizen of Indiana, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana. It was incorporated by an Act of the Legislature of Indiana. Subsequently the Legislature of Ohio passed an Act reciting the incorporation of the company in Indiana, and declared that "the corporate powers granted to said company by the Act of Indiana, incorporating the same, be recognized." At a later date the Legislature of Ohio passed an Act authorizing the extension of the company's road to Cincinnati, declaring that the intention of the previous Act "was to recognize, affirm, and adopt the charter of the said Ohio & Mississippi Railroad Company, as enacted by the Legislature of the State of Indiana."

In the opinion of the court it is said "that a corporation by the name and style of the plaintiff appears to have been chartered by the States of Indiana and Ohio," and, therefore, that the company was a "distinct and separate corporate body in Indiana from the corporate body of the same name in Ohio."

In R. R. Co. v. Harris, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 65, 83 [20: 354, 358], it appeared that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company was incorporated by the State of Maryland for the purpose of securing the construction of a railroad from Baltimore to some suitable point on the Ohio River. Subsequently, Virginia, by a statute, which set out at large the Maryland Act, declared that "The same rights and privileges shall be and are hereby granted to the aforesaid company, in the territory of Virginia, as are granted to it within the territory of Maryland"—the company to be subject to the same pains, penalties and obligations as were imposed by the Maryland Act, and the same rights, privileges and immunities being secured to Virginia and her citizens, except as to lateral roads. Congress, at a later date, passed an Act authorizing the company to extend its road into the District of Columbia, and to exercise "The same powers, rights and privileges, and shall be subject to the same restrictions in the construction and extension of said lateral road into and within the said District, as they may exercise or be subject to under or by virtue of the [403] said Act of incorporation in the construction and extension of any railroad in the State of Maryland," etc. Touching the question whether the legislation of Virginia and of Congress created a new corporation, this court said: "In both, the original Maryland Act is referred to, but neither expressly or by implication creates a new corporation. The company was chartered to construct a railroad in Virginia as well as in Maryland. The latter could not be done without the consent of Virginia. That consent was given upon the terms which she thought necessary to prescribe. * * * The permission was broad and comprehensive in its scope, but it was a license and nothing more. It was given to the Maryland body as such, and that body was the same in all its elements and in its identity afterwards as before." Referring to Ohio & M. R. R. Co. v. Wheeler [supra], the court said that, "As the case appears in the report, we think the judgment of the court was correctly given. It was the case of an Indiana railroad company, licensed by Ohio, suing a citizen of Indiana in the federal court of that State."

In R. R. Co. v. Vance, 96 U.S. 450 [24: 752], an Act of the Illinois Legislature, referring to a lease made by the Indianapolis & St. Louis Railroad Company, an Indiana corporation, of a certain railroad in Illinois, belonging to the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad Company, an Illinois corporation, and declaring that "The said lessees, their associates, successors, and assigns, shall be a railroad corporation in this State, under the style of the Indianapolis & St. Louis Railroad Company, and shall possess the same or as large powers as are possessed by said lessor corporation, and such other powers as are usual to railroad corporations," was held not to be a mere license to an Indiana corporation to exert its corporate powers, and enjoy its corporate rights and privileges, in Illinois, but to create the lessees, their associates, successors, and assigns, a distinct corporate body in the latter State. The court said: "It does more; it gives the style by which that corporation shall be known; still further, it does not authorize the complainant corporation [404] to exercise in Illinois the corporate powers granted by the laws of Indiana, but confers by affirmative language, upon the corporation, which it declares shall be a railroad corporation in Illinois, the same or as large, powers, as are possessed by an Illinois corporation, the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad Company, and, in addition, such other powers as are usual to railroad corporations. The Indianapolis & St. Louis Railroad Company, as lessee of the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad Company was thus created, by apt words, a corporation in Illinois. The fact that it bears the same name as that given to the company incorporated by Indiana cannot change the fact that it is a distinct corporation, having a separate existence derived from the Legislature of another State."

In Memphis & C. R. R. Co. v. Alabama, 107 U. S. 581, 584 [27: 518], the question was as to the citizenship of the corporation against which that suit was brought by the State of Alabama. The State of Tennessee, in 1846, created a corporation by the name of the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company. The Legislature of Alabama subsequently passed an Act entitled "An Act to Incorporate the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company." That Act referred to the Act of the Tennessee Legislature, and granted to said company a right of way through Alabama, to construct its road between certain points named, declaring that it should have all the rights and privileges granted to it by the said Act of incorporation, subject to the restrictions therein imposed. The statute contained other provisions of the same general nature, from all of which, however, it was not, as this court observed, made quite clear, whether the company referred to in the body of the Act was the one which the Act in its title purported to incorporate, or the one created by the Tennessee Act and referred to in the preamble of the Alabama Act. But there were other sections expressly referring to the company "hereby incorporated," that is, incorporated by the Alabama Act. The whole of the latter Act, taken together, the court said, manifests the understanding and intention of the Legislature of Alabama that the corporation, which was thereby granted a right of way to construct through that State a railroad "was and should be in law a corporation of the State of Alabama, although having one and the same organization with the corporation of the same name previously established by the Legislature of Tennessee."

In the recent case of Pennsylvania R. R. Co. [405] v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. R. Co. 118 U. S. 295, 296 [ante, 84], the general question now before us received careful consideration. It was there said: "It does not seem to admit of question that a corporation of one State, owning property and doing business in another State, by permission of the latter, does not thereby become a citizen of this State also. And so a corporation of Illinois, authorized by its laws to build a railroad across the State from the Mississippi River to its eastern boundary, may, by permission of the State of Indiana, extend its road a few miles within the limits of the latter, or indeed, through the entire State, and may use and operate the line as one road by the permission of the State, without thereby becoming a corporation or a citizen of the State of Indiana. Nor does it seem to us that an Act of the Legislature conferring upon this corporation of Illinois by its Illinois corporate name, such powers to enable it to use and control that part of the road within the State of Indiana, as have been conferred on it by the State which created it, constitutes it a corporation of Indiana. It may not be easy in all such cases to distinguish between the purpose to create a new corporation, which shall owe its existence to the law or statute under consideration, and the intent to enable the corporation already in existence, under laws of another State, to exercise its functions in the State where it is so received. To make such a company a corporation of another State the language used must imply creation, or adoption in such form as to confer the power usually exercised over corporations by the State, or by the Legislature, and such allegiance as a state corporation owes to its creator. The mere grant of privileges or powers to it as an existing corporation, without more, does not do this, and does not make it a citizen of the State conferring such powers." So that the essential inquiry here must be, whether, within the doctrine established in the cases we have cited, the State of Tennessee, by [406] her legislation, granted a mere license to the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company to exercise within her limits all or some of the powers conferred upon it by the State of Kentucky, or established a new corporation over which she could exert such direct control and authority as is usually exerted by a State over corporations of her own creation.

The solution of this question depends upon the intent of the Legislature of Tennessee, as gathered from the words used in the statutes now to be examined.

We lay out of view the Acts of the General Assembly of Tennessee, approved February 1, 1850, incorporating a company by the name of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, and the Act of February 9, 1850, entitled "An Act to Incorporate the Nashville & Louisville Railroad Company." It appears in evidence that no organization was effected under those Acts; and we do not understand the counsel for the plaintiff to rely upon either of them as showing that the present defendant is a corporation of Tennessee.

By an Act of the General Assembly of Kentucky, approved March 5, 1850, a corporation was created by the name of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, with power to construct a railroad "from the City of Louisville to the Tennessee line, in the direction of Nashville;" and by an Act of the same body, approved March 20, 1851, authority was given to connect said road "with any railroad extending to Nashville, on such terms and conditions as the two companies may, from time to time, agree on, for the through transportation and travel of freight and passengers."

On the 4th of December, 1851, the General Assembly of Tennessee passed an Act, the title of which is "An Act to Incorporate the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company." As the question of citizenship depends mainly upon the construction of that Act, it is given in full, as follows:

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the right of way for the construction of a railroad from the line between the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, so as to connect the cities of Louis- [407]
ville and Nashville by railroad communication, be, and is hereby, granted to the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, incorporated by the Legislature of Kentucky, with all the rights, powers, and privileges, and subject to all the restrictions and liabilities set forth and prescribed in the charter granted to said Company by the Legislature of Kentucky, and approved March the 5th, 1850, and the amendments thereto passed by said Legislature, and approved March the 20th, 1851, for the term of nine hundred and ninety-nine years, except as further provided in this Act.

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That said Company shall construct said railroad from the boundary line between said States, beginning at said line where it shall be intersected by that part of said railroad which is to be within the State of Kentucky, to (a point within or convenient to) the City of Nashville; Provided, That in the construction of said railroad said Company shall commence at each end of the line at the same time, and continue the work from each end until said railroad is completed; Provided further, That said Company shall not be compelled to use the capital stock subscribed and paid in by the citizens, companies, corporations, or counties in the State of Kentucky in the construction of that part of said railroad lying in the State of Tennessee until the part thereof lying in Kentucky is completed.

"Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, That so soon as said Company shall have completed five miles of said railroad from Nashville they may commence and prosecute their business, as provided in the twenty-first section of said charter; that the tariff of charges for transportation of passengers, and for goods, wares, merchandise, and other articles and commodities, shall be equal on all parts of said railroad in proportion to distance, and that equal facilities for the transportation of the same in either direction shall be furnished.

Sec. 4. Be it further enacted, That the stockholders in the State of Tennessee shall be entitled to be represented in said Company by directors residing in Tennessee in proportion to their stock, to be chosen by the stockholders of the Company in the manner and at the time the other directors are chosen.

"Sec. 5. Be it further enacted, That nothing in this Act, or in said charter or amendments [408] thereto, shall be so construed as to prohibit the Legislature of Tennessee from passing any law authorizing the construction of railroads within this State parallel to, crossing, or to unite with said railroad from Louisville to Nashville, and the State of Tennessee reserves the right so to do.

"Sec. 6. Be it further enacted, That the twentieth section of said charter and the fourth section of the amendments thereto shall be void and of no force or effect within this State.

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the twenty-third, twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth and twenty-ninth sections of the Act of 11th December, 1845, incorporating the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company, be, and are hereby, made a part of the said charter of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, to be in force within this State, and that this bill shall take effect from and after its passage; Provided, That the Commonwealth of Kentucky shall grant to the State of Tennessee or to such companies as the General Assembly may charter, the right of way from Nashville to intersect with the Lexington and Danville Railroad at Danville, Harrodsburg, or such other point on that road as the Company may designate, provided it does not interfere with any vested rights of the citizens of Kentucky, with the like powers and privileges granted to this Company.

"Sec. 8. Be it further enacted, That the Company shall bring said railway to the City of Nashville, or South Nashville, and locate their depot convenient to the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, so as to form the connection."

Some stress is laid upon the title of that Act, as indicating a purpose to create a corporation, and not simply to recognize an existing one of another State, and invest it with authority to exert its functions within the State of Tennessee. While the title of a statute should not be entirely ignored in determining the legislative intent, it cannot be used "to extend or restrain any positive provisions contained in the body of the Act," and is of little weight, even when the meaning of such provisions is doubtful. Hadden v. Collector, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 110 [409]
[18: 519]. Looking, then, at the body of the Tennessee Act of December 4, 1851, we find no language clearly evincing a purpose to create a new corporation, or to adopt one of another

State, in such form as to establish the same relations, in law, between the latter corporation and the State of Tennessee, as would exist in the case of one created by that State. The Act grants to a named company "incorporated by the Legislature of Kentucky" a right of way, within designated limits, for the construction of a railroad, with all the rights, powers and privileges, and subject to all the restrictions and liabilities prescribed in its original and amended charter, "except as further provided in this Act." The remaining sections of the Act are, in form, additions and alterations of the charter of the Kentucky corporation; but, in effect, they only prescribe the terms and conditions upon which that corporation was given a right of way and permitted to construct a railroad and exercise its powers in Tennessee.

If the Legislature of the latter State intended to do anything more than grant a license to a corporation of another State to construct a railroad and exert its corporate functions within her limits, it was intended to bring into existence a corporation subject to the paramount authority of Tennessee as were other corporations created by her laws, certain sections of the Act incorporating the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company would not have been made a part of the charter of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, to be in force simply "in this [that] State," but would have been incorporated into the Company's charter, to be in force wherever and whenever it exerted the powers granted to it. And the same observation applies to the proviso in the 7th section of the Act of December 4, 1851, which requires that Kentucky should grant to Tennessee, or to such companies as the latter State might "charter," the right of way from Nashville to intersect with a named road at certain points in Kentucky, with the like powers and privileges granted by Kentucky to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company.

[410] Taking the whole of that Act together, we are satisfied that it was not within the mind of the Legislature of Tennessee to create a new corporation, but only to give the assent of that State to the exercise by the defendant, within her limits, and subject to certain conditions, of some of the powers granted to it by the State creating it.

This construction is not, if indeed it could be, affected by the subsequent legislation of Tennessee. While the titles of the acts of January 16, 1852, December 15, 1855, and March 20, 1858, give some slight support to the position taken by the plaintiff, the Acts themselves do not militate against the conclusions here expressed. In legal effect, they only impose other terms and conditions than those prescribed in the original Act, upon the exercise by the defendant, within Tennessee, of the powers and privileges conferred by its charter, as granted by Kentucky.

Upon the authority of the cases cited, and for the reasons herein stated, we are of opinion that the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company is a corporation of Kentucky, and not of Tennessee, and, consequently, that the action was removable, upon its petition and bond, into the Circuit Court of the United States.

It only remains to consider the assignments of error relating to the charge to the jury, and to the refusal of the court to give certain instructions in behalf of the plaintiff. The bill of exceptions states that "on the trial of this cause the following testimony was submitted to the jury." Then follows the evidence of numerous witnesses for the respective sides, given in narrative form, and the charge of the court. The court, among other things, charged the jury that the plaintiff did not himself exercise reasonable care and prudence, but was guilty of negligence, so that had the people upon the train, or the persons controlled by him, been injured, they could have recovered against his employer for his negligence. "Under the facts proven in this case," the judge said, "were you to give a verdict against the defendant, I should feel bound to set it aside and grant a new trial." In such a state of the case it is my duty to instruct you to find a verdict for the defendant, and I accordingly do so, declining to give the instructions requested by plaintiff's counsel." [411] The bill of exceptions does not, in express words, state that it contains all the evidence introduced at the trial.

Assuming, but without deciding, that the bill of exceptions sufficiently shows that all the evidence is embodied in the record, the question arises whether the court erred in withdrawing the case from the jury, and directing a verdict for the Company. In Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Doster, 106 U. S. 32 [27: 66], it was said that "Where a cause fairly depends upon the effect or weight of testimony, it is one for the consideration and determination of the jury, under proper directions as to the principles of law involved;" and that a case should never be withdrawn from them "unless the testimony be of such a conclusive character as to compel the court, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, to set aside a verdict in opposition to it." So, in Randall v. Balt. & O. R. R. Co. 109 U. S. 482 [27: 1005], it was declared to be the settled law of this court, "That when the evidence given at the trial, with all inferences that the jury could justifiably draw from it, is insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff, so that such a verdict, if returned, must be set aside, the court is not bound to submit the case to the jury, but may direct a verdict for the defendant."

These authorities sustain the charge to the jury. The evidence makes a case of utter recklessness upon the part of the deceased, who was a section boss of the defendant, charged with the duty of keeping its road in repair between certain points, so that trains could pass over it in safety. He was guilty of the grossest negligence in running his hand car into the deep cut where he was injured, without having sent anyone ahead to watch for, and warn, the passenger train, which he knew was approaching, or would soon reach, that point on the road. But for his negligence in that respect he would not have been injured.

It is said, however, that despite any negligence to be fairly imputed to the deceased, the agents of the Company, who were in charge of the passenger train, might have avoided injuring him had they exercised reasonable diligence to that end. This position is supposed [412] by counsel to be justified by sections 1166, 1167, and 1168 of the Code of Tennessee, which provide:

Sec. 1298 (1166). "Every railroad company shall keep the engineer, fireman, or some other person upon the locomotive, always upon the lookout ahead; and when any person, animal or other obstruction appears upon the road, the alarm whistle shall be sounded, the brakes put down, and every possible means employed to stop the train and prevent an accident."

Sec. 1299 (1167). "Every railroad company that fails to observe these precautions, or cause them to be observed by its agents and servants, shall be responsible for all damages to persons or property occasioned by or resulting from any accident or collision that may occur."

Sec. 1300 (1168). "No railroad company that observes, or causes to be observed, these precautions, shall be responsible for any damages done to persons or property on its road. The proof that it has observed said precautions shall be upon the company." Code, M. & V., §§ 1298–1300.

Without considering the question whether those sections are intended for the benefit of the general public only, not for the servants of the Company—especially one whose negligence caused or contributed to cause the accident—it is sufficient to say that the court below correctly held that the requirements of the Tennessee Code were complied with by the Company, so far at least as the circumstances attending the injury of the deceased are concerned. A verdict based upon a different view of the evidence should have been set aside, upon motion by the defendant.

The jury having been properly directed, in view of all the evidence, to find a verdict for the Company, it is unnecessary to consider the exceptions taken to its refusal to grant certain instructions asked in behalf of the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

[535] THORN WIRE HEDGE COMPANY ET AL., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

CASSIUS D. FULLER AND BURT G. PATRICK.

Removal of causes—action of trespass against sheriff—intervention under Minnesota Statutes—sheriff, a necessary party.

An action of trespass against a sheriff for a wrongful seizure of the property of the plaintiff, in which the plaintiff and defendant are citizens of the same State, is not removable upon petition of interveners, who are citizens of another State and who have placed themselves on record as promoters of his alleged trespass, the sheriff being a necessary party defendant. The case is not altered by the fact that, if the intervention was under a certain local statute, the property of the interveners would have to be sold first under a joint judgment against them and the sheriff.

Submitted May 10, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Charles D. Kerr, for plaintiffs in error.

The effect of the intervention was to shift from the sheriff to the interveners the entire burden and responsibility of the suit, so far as the official action of the officer is concerned.

Greene v. Klinger, 10 Fed. Rep. 689; Greene v. Kingsley, 10 Cent. L. J. 47; Texas v. Lewis, 12 Fed. Rep. 1; Re Iowa & M. Construction Co. 10 Fed. Rep. 401.

Upon general principles, and independent of the statutes, we claim that when such a bond of indemnity has been given by the execution plaintiff, he thenceforth becomes the substantial defendant between whom and the person claiming the goods levied on, there is a separate controversy.

Beuttel v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 26 Fed. Rep. 50; Mayor of N. Y. v. Steamboat Co. 24 Fed. Rep. 817; Township of Aroma v. Auditor, 9 Biss. 289; Removal Cases, 100 U. S. 457 (25: 698).

It is clearly held that if the suit at the time of the removal had assumed such a phase that the resident defendant had become in effect a nominal party merely, while the nonresident defendant was the real party in interest, the case would be removable.

Wood v. Davis, 59 U. S. 18 How. 467 (15: 460); Sioux City etc. R. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 27 Fed. Rep. 771; Foss v. First Nat. Bank of Denver, 1 McCrary, 474; Allen v. Ryerson, 2 Dill. 501.

Mr. Thomas Wilson, for defendants in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error brought under section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. 470, for the review of an order of the circuit court remanding a suit which had been removed from the District Court of Freeborn County, Minnesota. The facts are these: Cassius D. Fuller and Burt G. Patrick, citizens of Minnesota, doing business as hardware merchants in the City of Albert Lea, began the suit October 12, 1886, against Jacob Larson, sheriff of the county, for trespass, in taking possession of their stock of goods and destroying their business. The sheriff answered, November 13, 1886, to the effect that his taking was under the authority of an execution issued upon a judg- [536] ment in the same court in favor of the Thorn Wire Hedge Company, an Illinois corporation, against George A. Patrick, and that the goods were the property of the execution debtor, which had been transferred by him to Fuller & Patrick, the plaintiffs, in fraud of the rights of his creditors.

On the same day the Thorn Wire Hedge Company, J. W. Calkins, Aaron K. Stiles, and Gary G. Calkins, intervened as defendants in the action, and filed an answer, substantially the same in all respects as that of the sheriff, with the following in addition:

"That in making the levy of said execution and in selling the said property under the same, the said sheriff (Larson) acted under the express direction of said intervener, the Thorn Wire Hedge Company, and upon indemnity furnished him by said Thorn Wire Hedge Company, with said interveners, J. W. Calkins, Aaron K. Stiles, and Gary G. Calkins, as sureties and bondsmen, according to the statute in such case made and provided, and in that behalf said interveners acted, * * * without any malice or want of probable cause or intent to wrong anybody, and solely with intent to obtain payment of a just debt due from said George A. Patrick, and out of the property which he owned and had attempted to cover up, but which really belonged to him. * * * That by reason of said facts, said interveners, the Thorn Wire Hedge Company, J. W. Calkins, Aaron K. Stiles, and Gary G. Calkins, acting under the statute in such case made and provided, are the parties primarily liable for the acts and doings of said defendant Jacob Larson, and as such are interested in the matters in litigation in this action and in the success of the defendant therein and in resisting the claim of the plaintiffs therein. Wherefore said Thorn Wire Hedge Company, J. W. Calkins, Aaron K. Stiles, and Gary G. Calkins intervene in this action and pray that said plaintiffs take nothing by this action."

To these answers the plaintiffs replied, and on the 22d of November the interveners presented to the district court their petition for the removal [537] of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States, in which they state that the plaintiffs and the defendant Larson were citizens of Minnesota, and the interveners and petitioners citizens of Illinois; and,

"5. That such taking, detention, and ultimate sale * * * were all done by said Jacob Larson in his official capacity as such sheriff, and at the request of your petitioners and by virtue of a writ of execution duly allowed and issued out of the District Court of the Tenth Judicial District of the State of Minnesota, for the County of Freeborn, in an action therein pending in that court between said petitioner, the Thorn Wire Hedge Company, as plaintiff, and one George A. Patrick, as defendant, and under indemnity furnished by said Thorn Wire Hedge Company, with said petitioners, J. W. Calkins, Aaron K. Stiles, and Gary G. Calkins, as bondsmen and sureties therein to such sheriff, pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, and to save him harmless from all damages and costs for and on account of so doing; and accordingly said sheriff has duly notified said petitioners to defend this said action; and accordingly said petitioners, pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, have duly intervened in said action as parties defendant thereto, and have duly made and filed in said action their pleading as such intervening parties defendant.

"6. That, in virtue of said facts, said defendant, Jacob Larson, was at all such times and in all said matters, so far as said plaintiffs are concerned, the mere agent of said petitioners provided for them by law in such cases; and there can be a final determination of the controversy in said action, so far as concerns said petitioners, without the presence of such agent, said defendant Jacob Larson; and, in fact, the real controversy in said action is wholly between said plaintiffs on the one side and said petitioners on the other side; and the same can be fully determined as between them.

"7. That your petitioners have reason to believe, and do believe, that, from prejudice as well as from local influence, they will not be able to obtain justice in said action in said state court.

"Wherefore, said petitioners pray that said action be removed into the United States Cir- [538] cuit Court to be held within and for the District of Minnesota, and herewith present the bond and surety as in such cases required."

Upon this petition an order of removal was made and the suit entered in the circuit court December 11, 1886; and, on the 21st of the same month, it was remanded on motion of Fuller and Patrick. To reverse that order this writ of error was brought.

We have been referred by the parties to the following sections of chapter 66 of the General Statutes (1878) of Minnesota as authority for the intervention of the execution creditor and his sureties in the action:

Sec. 131. "Intervention. Any person who has an interest in the matter at litigation, in the success of either of the parties to the action, or against either or both, may become a party to any action or proceeding between other persons, either by joining the plaintiff in claiming what is sought by the complaint, or by uniting with the defendant in resisting the claim of the plaintiff, or by demanding anything adversely to both the plaintiff and defendant, or either of them, either before or after issue has been joined in the cause, and before the trial commences. The court shall determine the issue made by the intervention at the same time that the issue in the main action is decided, and the intervener has no right to delay; and if the claim of the intervener is not sustained, he shall pay all the costs of the intervention. The intervention shall be by complaint, which must set forth the facts on which the intervention rests; and all the pleadings therein shall be governed by the same principles and rules as obtain in other pleadings. But if such complaint is filed during term, the court shall direct a time in which an answer shall be filed thereto."

Sec. 154. "Claim of property by third person—affidavit—indemnity by plaintiff. If any property levied upon or taken by a sheriff, by virtue of a writ of execution, attachment, or other process, is claimed by any other person than the defendant or his agent, and such person, his agent or attorney, makes affidavit of his title thereto, or right to the possession thereof, stating the value thereof, and the ground of such title or right, the sheriff may release such levy or taking, unless the plaintiff, on demand, indemnify the sheriff against such claim, by bond executed by two sufficient sureties, accompanied by their affidavit that they are each worth double the value of the property as specified in the affidavit of the claimant of such property, and are freeholders and residents of the county; and no claim to such property by any other person than the defendant or his agent shall be valid against the sheriff, unless so made; and, notwithstanding such claim, when so made, he may retain such property under levy a reasonable time to demand such indemnity."

Sec. 155. "Plaintiff to be impleaded with [542] sheriff in action against him. If, in such case, the person claiming the ownership of such property commences an action against the sheriff for the taking thereof, the obligors in the bond provided for in the preceding section, and the plaintiff in such execution, attachment, or other process, shall, on motion of such sheriff, be impleaded with him in such action. When in such case a judgment is rendered against the sheriff and his codefendants, an execution shall be immediately issued thereon, and the property of such codefendants shall be first exhausted before that of the sheriff is sold to satisfy such execution."

The record does not state in direct terms which of the forms of proceeding provided for in these sections was adopted. The interveners claim they went into the suit under sections 154 and 155, and the plaintiffs that it was under section 131. In the view we take of the case this question is quite immaterial. The interveners, in their answer, state in positive terms that Larson in all that he did acted under the express direction of the Thorn Wire Hedge Company and upon the indemnity furnished him for that purpose, and that they are the parties primarily liable for his acts and doings. In their petition for removal they are even more explicit, and say that he "was at all such times, and in all such matters, so far as said plaintiffs are concerned, the mere agent for the petitioners provided for them by law." In other words, they have by their pleadings placed themselves on record as joint actors with the sheriff in all that he has done, and as promoters of his trespass, if it be one. The suit, therefore, stood at the time of the removal precisely as it would if it had been begun originally against all the defendants upon an allegation of a joint trespass. By coming into the suit the interveners did not deprive the plaintiffs of their right of action against the sheriff. He is still, so far as they are concerned, a necessary party to the suit. The interveners may unite with him to resist the claim of the plaintiffs; but by their doing so the nature of the action is in no way changed. The cause of action is still the original alleged trespass. At first the suit was against him who [543] actually committed the trespass alone; now it is against him and his aiders and abettors, who concede, upon the face of the record, that they are liable if he is. As the case stood, therefore, when it was removed, it was by citizens of Minnesota against another citizen of Minnesota and citizens of Illinois, for an alleged trespass committed by all the defendants acting together and in concert. If one is liable all are liable. The judgment, if in favor of the plaintiffs, will be a joint judgment against all the defendants.

That such a suit is not removable was decided in Pirie v. Tvedt, 115 U. S. 41 [29: 331]; and Sloane v. Anderson, 117 U. S. 275 [29: 899]. The fact that if the intervention was had under sections 154 and 155, the property of the interveners must first be exhausted on execution before that of the sheriff is sold, does not alter the case. The liability of all the defendants upon the cause of action is still joint, so far as the plaintiffs are concerned. By getting the interveners in, the sheriff will be able to establish his right of indemnity from them; but that does not in any way change the rights of the plaintiffs. The interveners do not seek to relieve themselves from liability to the sheriff if he is bound, but to show that neither he nor they are liable to the plaintiffs

It follows that the order to remand was properly made, and it is, consequently, affirmed.

FOURTH NATIONAL BANK OF ST. LOUIS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 528-534.)

Negotiable paper—fraudulent bill—false bill of lading—action against bank, which had made advances and received proceeds—fraud—instruction to find for defendants, sustained.

In an action by the acceptors of a bill of exchange, drawn against a shipment of cotton in bales which the drawers had fraudulently reduced in weight, against a bank, which had made advances on the cotton prior to its shipment and which had received the proceeds of the bill, it is held:

a. That the bank is not shown to have participated in the fraud; that it was not the owner of the cotton;

b. That it had a right to suppose that the custom of reweighing by the transportation company would be followed; and,

c. That the court below properly instructed the jury to find for the defendant.

[No. 268.]

Argued April 27, 1887. Decided May 27, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. Reported below, 20 Fed. Rep. 225. Affirmed.

The history, facts and case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Frederick N. Judson, Warwick Hough and John H. Overall, for plaintiffs in error:

Camfield, the pledgeor, to whom the defendant, the pledgee, delivered the documents of title (the cotton notes) for the temporary purpose of surrendering them in exchange for a bill of lading, such bill of lading to be returned as a "substituted security," received and held such securities and prepared and returned such bill of lading in a fiduciary capacity; i. e., as agent of the defendant.

Story, Bailm. § 299; Jones, Pledges, § 86; Clark v. Iselin, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 360 (22:568); Casey v. Cavaroc, 96 U. S. 476 (24:783); White v. Platt, 5 Den. 269; Hays v. Riddle, 1 Sandf. N. Y. 248; Nottebohn v. Maas, 8 Robt. N. Y. 253; Macomber v. Parker, 14 Pick. 497; Reeves v. Capper, 5 Bing. N.C. 136; Way v. Davidson, 12 Gray, 465; Thayer v. Dwight, 104 Mass. 254; Bruley v. Rose, 57 Iowa, 651; Cooper v. Ray, 47 Ill. 53; Hutton v. Arnett, 51 Ill. 198.

The false statement of weights being inserted by Camfield, while thus acting as agent of defendant, and effecting the exchange of securities on its behalf, defendant, receiving and forwarding such false bill of lading, and collecting and retaining the proceeds of the fraud, thus obtaining payment in full of its own claim, which could not have been paid except by means of the fraud, is in law responsible to plaintiffs in error for their loss sustained in consequence of such fraud.

Messrs. G. A. Finkelnburg and George A. Madill, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri.

The plaintiffs in error were the plaintiffs in the original action, the gravamen of which was that the defendant, the Fourth National Bank of St. Louis, conspired with the firm of Norvell, Camfield & Co., who were dealers in cotton in that city, to obtain from the plaintiffs, McLeod & Reid, residing in the City of Glasgow, Scotland, the acceptance of a draft drawn by Norvell, Camfield & Co. upon said plaintiffs for £6,000 sterling, and that this draft was accompanied by a fraudulent bill of lading, on the strength of which plaintiffs accepted and were compelled to pay it. The bill of lading was for a certain number of bales of cotton, which were falsely represented to contain 276,850 pounds; whereas, the aggregate weight of these bales when reweighed at the place of delivery was only 192,385 pounds.

[529] That this bill of lading was false, that it was gotten up by fraud, and that this fraud deceived the plaintiffs, there is no question. Nor is there any doubt that the fraud was perpetrated by Norvell, Camfield & Co. The case was tried before a jury on the general issue, by which the Bank denied all the allegations of fraud, and in general everything charged in the declaration. The court refused several requests to charge made by the plaintiffs with regard to the connection of the Bank with this fraud, and in the end peremptorily instructed the jury that there was no evidence to support such an allegation of fraud on the part of the defendant, and that they must find for the Bank.

This bill of exceptions, like so many others that we find in the records that have been sent up to us recently, is simply a stenographic report of all that took place at the trial; and we are expected to consider the whole of this evidence and pick out such portions of it as may be pertinent to the issue, as if addressed to us originally, and to ascertain whether there was any evidence which should have been left to the jury on the question of the participation of the defendant in the fraud.

The main facts in the case are substantially as follows:

Norvell, Camfield & Co. were dealers in cotton in St. Louis. They bought this commodity throughout the cotton region, brought it to that city, and then sold it in the markets of the Eastern States and of Europe. To enable them to carry on their extensive business they required large advances from the capitalists of St. Louis, and these were obtained mainly from its banks. The defendant Bank in this case had so advanced them about $64,000; and in every instance, as such advances were made, the firm deposited with the Bank what were known as "cotton notes." These were instruments made by a warehouse company, whose business it was to receive and take care of cotton until it was sold, or its delivery demanded by the person who originally deposited it in the warehouse, or by some holder of the cotton notes. Each note represented a bale of cotton, and the following is the form of these instruments in general use in that business:

"[No. of bale.] Received in store of —— [530]
——, one bale of cotton, in apparent good order, of the above number and following marks [marks, if any], deliverable to bearer upon return of this receipt, and payment of warehouse charges, risk of fire excepted.

"(Signed) —— ——, Secretary."

The cotton of Norvell, Camfield & Co., which is the subject of this controversy, was stored in the warehouse of the St. Louis Cotton Compress Company, and the notes therefor were in the hands of the Bank, when Camfield, one of that firm, without obtaining the notes from the Bank, or any orders from it, had a very large amount of this cotton transferred to a cotton "pickery," as it was called. There the bales were opened, the cotton picked, reassorted, and repacked, and the tags with the numbers on them, which represented the cotton as it was originally delivered to the warehouse company, reattached to these readjusted bales. In doing this the quantity of cotton in each bale was so much reduced that the difference was made, which we have already stated, between the amount which was called for by the bill of lading and the amount which was received in Glasgow.

By what means Camfield obtained the cotton from the warehouse without the production of the notes is not explained, nor is it very material in this case, as there is no evidence to show that the Bank had anything to do with that transaction, but was informed of it after it was over and the cotton returned to the warehouse. Upon being so informed it took some steps to ascertain the amount of the loss it might incur by this multiplication of the bales out of this same cotton, had some fifteen or sixteen bales reweighed, and called upon Camfield to put up further margins, which he did.

During this time, or shortly afterwards, and while the matter remained in this condition, Mr. Norvell, who was in Europe, negotiated the sale of this cotton to the plaintiffs, and Mr. Camfield, his partner in St. Louis, forwarded it to Glasgow by way of New York. In doing this, he forwarded it by railroad from St. Louis to the Atlantic coast, and took from the [531] transportation company at St. Louis a bill of lading, describing the bales by their numbers and weights, which amounted to the aggregate number of pounds already stated. In order to obtain these bales for shipment from the warehouse company, Camfield had to produce the notes which were in the possession of the Bank. Of course he could only do this by the Bank intrusting him with the notes for the short time necessary to make the shipment and procure the bill of lading, when, having delivered up the notes to the warehouse company in order to get possession of the cotton for shipment, he was to return the bill of lading, which represented the cotton, to the Bank.

In all cases of shipments of this character from St. Louis to the Eastern States or Europe, the transportation company, on giving its bill of lading, requires a reweighing of the cotton upon delivery to it, and upon that being done, the weights are marked upon the bales or certified by the weigher in a schedule or statement. There are persons appointed for this special purpose of reweighing cotton for transhipment. It is upon the strength of this reweighing that the transportation company makes out its bill of lading.

What was done in the present case was, that Camfield induced the clerk, or other officer who made out this bill of lading, to accept his own statement of the weight of the bales and to give his bill of lading accordingly, without ever having the cotton reweighed or having any certificate of the reweigher thereto. The number of bales were all right, but in this way, Camfield obtained from the transportation company a false bill of lading. Upon this Camfield, in the name of his firm, Norwell, Camfield & Co., drew his draft upon the plaintiffs at Glasgow, at sixty days, for a sum corresponding to the amount in the bill of lading, and to the contract price which Norvell had made with them in Europe. This draft the defendant Bank declined to buy, and Norvell who had returned to America, negotiated and sold it to Knoblauch & Lichtenstein, bankers in the City of New York; and the money, or so much of it as was necessary to pay its debt, was turned over to the defendant.

[532] Of course the plaintiffs, who had accepted the draft on its presentation, with the bill of lading, were bound to pay it at its maturity, although in the mean time they had discovered the discrepancy between the amount of the cotton actually shipped and that described in the bill of lading.

The defendant Bank never indorsed this bill of lading; it was never made payable to it. It never did anything to give it currency or to make itself responsible for its accuracy, and it was no party to the bill of exchange. The whole case of the plaintiffs is that, having received the proceeds of the sale of this bill of lading from Knoblauch & Lichtenstein in discharge of the debt of Norvell, Camfield & Co. to the Bank, it so acted in regard to the matter as to be a participant in the fraud which was practiced by that firm. The whole case then turns upon the truth of this allegation.

It is attempted to be supported principally upon the ground that Mr. Biebinger, who was the cashier of the Bank, was aware of the change made in the quantity of cotton in the "pickery," where it was rebaled. But it does not appear that he, or any other officer of the Bank, had any reason to suppose that the number of bales repacked at that establishment was very considerable. They had fifteen or sixteen of them weighed, and called upon Camfield to make good the deficiency, so far as they knew of it, which he did. This was all that concerned them; they were only acting for themselves; there was no obligation between them and anybody else at that time to disclose this matter, as there was nobody then interested in the property but the Bank and the firm. They might very well have supposed that whenever this cotton was sold by the firm and was to be delivered, the rule for reweighing would be complied with, and that the purchaser of the cotton, or of the bill of lading, or of the bill of exchange drawn on it, would have seen to his own security in that matter, and would have relied, as he had a right to do, upon the sufficiency of the process of reweighing for that protection.

It is very clear from the evidence, and it is undisputed, that this reweighing is the uniform and regular custom, and that it constitutes the evidence of the weight of the bales in the final sale by the cotton dealer of St. Louis to the purchaser in the Eastern or European market. [533] Is there any evidence to show that the Bank was guilty of any fraud, or of any negligence which amounted to a fraud, or had any design to cheat anybody in this matter? When Camfield notified them that the cotton had been sold, and that he wanted to ship it, the use of the cotton notes, which they held as security for the amounts due to them, was necessarily to be intrusted to one of the owners, or to one of their agents, for the purpose of getting the cotton out of the warehouse. It could not remain there and at the same time go East; neither could it be obtained from the warehouse for shipment without the use and delivery of the notes. For the short time necessary to ship this cotton and obtain the bill of lading it was a matter of necessity, as well as a custom, unless the Bank would undertake the business for itself, to intrust these notes to the shipper in order that he might do it.

In this we see no injury to the plaintiffs. All the risk involved in it was borne by the defendant, who trusted Camfield with the notes which represented the property until he brought back the evidence that the cotton had been shipped. When this was done and Camfield had drawn his draft in the name of Norvell, Camfield & Co. upon the plaintiffs for the amount of the cotton, according to the terms of sale, it appears that he wanted to sell the draft to the Bank, but it refused to buy it, and it was finally negotiated to Knoblauch & Lichtenstein in New York, and the money placed to the credit of the defendant Bank there.

In order to sustain the argument, arising out of this transaction, that the defendant Bank was itself cognizant of this fraud, and that it was practiced for its benefit, it is argued by plaintiffs' counsel that the Bank was the owner of this cotton. If this proposition is in any way pertinent to the inquiry, it is not true. The Bank never had anything more than a pledge of the cotton as a security for the payment of its debt. The real ownership of the property always remained in Norvell, Camfield & Co. They could sell it at any time, and, after the payment of the debt due to the Bank, receive the remainder; if it had been sold for less than [534] the debt to the Bank, the loss would have been theirs, and not the Bank's, if they were solvent.

This firm did sell the cotton; it was not sold by the Bank; they shipped it, and the Bank did not even accept their bill of exchange drawn against the cotton in payment of their debt, but insisted on getting the money; and therefore the bill of exchange was sold in the City of New York.

The essential ownership of the cotton during all the time of this transaction was in Norvell, Camfield & Co., and any loss upon it was their loss, any profit upon it was their profit, and the Bank only had this modified control of it by means of the cotton notes of the warehouse company, which in effect they relinquished when they delivered those notes to Camfield. Their actual control over the cotton, or over its proceeds, ceased with the delivery, and their acceptance of the proceeds of the draft at the hands of the New York bankers, who bought it, was a thing they had a right to do, both in honor and according to all sound rules of mercantile law.

Certain letters of introduction, given by the defendant Bank to Mr. Norvell on a visit to Europe, made by him, and certain very guarded answers to inquiries made by a Dutch house in Europe as to his character and responsibility, are introduced to show that the Bank was using this means of enabling Norvell to raise the money for them by selling the cotton. We do not think these letters have any tendency to prove any such thing. And without going into the large mass of testimony on this subject, having considered the main and turning points in the controversy, and the principal points upon which plaintiffs rely to establish the fraud upon the part of the Bank, we are of opinion that the circuit court was right in telling the jury that there was no such evidence as justified them in finding a verdict for the plaintiffs.

Judgment affirmed.

F. J. D. LANIER et al., as Winslow, Lanier, & Co. v. JOHN NASH et al. [No. 200.]

Appeal from C. C., U. S. for N. D. of Ohio.
On motion to dismiss, and motion to restrain proceedings on execution. See S. C. on merits, ante, 947.
Mr. D. S. Hounshell, for the motion. Nem con.
December 6, 1886. Mr. Chief Justice Waite: The motion to dismiss is denied. We cannot dismiss a case for want of jurisdiction here, because the court below ought to have dismissed it. That is a question which goes to the merits of the appeal.
The further consideration of the motion for stay of execution is continued for notice to the other side to appear and show cause to the contrary, on the third Monday of the present month. Service is to be made by delivering a copy of the motion and of the brief which has been filed in support of it, and of this order, on the counsel, in the court below, of William Goodrich, against whom the stay is asked, at least one week before the day fixed for the hearing.

And further, in same case: January 17, 1887. Mr. Chief Justice Waite: This motion is denied. The motion papers do not show any necessity for the order which is asked, as there is no proof of any attempt on the part of Goodrich, since the appeal, to cause his judgment to be carried into execution. In the absence of anything to the contrary, it is to be presumed that the parties to a suit submit to a supersedeas obtained upon an appeal to this court.

March 14, 1887. On motion of Nash et al. for stay of execution pending appeal.
Messrs. D. S. Hounshell and Wm. Lawrence, for the motion.
Mr. Chief Justice Waite: This motion is denied. The judgment in favor of Goodrich is involved in this appeal only to the extent that it is a lien on the property covered by the mortgage, which is the subject matter of the suit. The executions which are complained of were issued after the appeal, and levied on other property. There is no such merger of the judgment nor supersedeas in this case as will operate to stay a proceeding against other property not involved herein.
